SIR: I transmit herewith separate petitions purporting to be signed by employés of the arsenal at Benicia, the arsenal at Rock Island, and the arsenal at Frankford, representing that the provisions of the "eight-hour law" (section 3733 of the Revised Statutes) are not complied with at those arsenals, and praying that they be enforced. The law referred to does not prohibit Government officers, for good reasons based on the peculiar character of the duty of the employé or upon the exigency of the public service, from making the agreement with an employé of the character named in the act, that he shall render his services for an agreed price during more or less than eight hours in a day, and it may be that some or all of the petitioners are employed under such an engagement. It is, however, my opinion that in the absence of a public exigency the continuance of active work at Government manufacturing establishments for more than eight hours a day is in violation of the intent of the statute, and you will please to instruct the commanding officers of the above-named arsenals accordingly.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
ROBERT T. LINCOLN, Secretary of War.

To the CHIEF OF ORDNANCE.

Senator CONNESS. Now, sir, I move to take up for consideration House bill No. 365 (page 3424, volume 68, Globe, second session Fortieth Congress).

* * * * * * *

Senator SHERMAN. I wish to offer an amendment:

"And unless otherwise provided by law, the rate of wages paid by the United States shall be the current rate for the same labor for the same time at the place of employment" (page 3424, volume 68, Globe, second session Fortieth Congress). * * *

Senator CONNESS. I hope this amendment will not be adopted. The passage of the bill with this amendment would amount to nothing. * * * It would simply be a reduction of two hours' labor. * * *

[SHERMAN'S speech on his amendment.]

All I desire is if the United States Government chooses to take the lead in making eight hours a day's work, that it shall not be compelled to pay for that eight hours' work more than any private individual would pay.

I have no objection to the bill (with this amendment), for then the same amount of work done for the United States will bear the same price as if done for an individual, no more and no less.

[Mr. Morton in reply.]

Mr. President, as I understand the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio, I am not in favor of it. I think it will virtually defeat the object of this bill.

Mr. CONNESS. Of course it does.

Mr. MORTON. It proposes to adjust the rate of wages according to the length of time during which labor is performed. The effect of it would be to bring down the rate of wages, because the time for labor is shortened that much.

Upon the question that this law is to be an experiment to determine whether as much work would be performed in eight hours as in ten Mr. Morton said: "It can not be settled and the experiment can not be made if the wages in the very beginning are reduced 20 per cent., which would be the practical effect of the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, because, as I understand his amendment, it proposes that the wages shall be reduced as the hours are in point of time."

[Remarks of Senator STEWART.]

The amendment of the Senator from Ohio certainly on no theory would be right, and I think on a moment's reflection the Senator himself will see that, because I believe that it is admitted on all hands that men will do more work per hour if they work eight hours than they will if they work ten hours a day. If not admitted, I think it is a self-evident proposition. I think it is one of those axioms that require very little demonstration. I say a man will do more per hour who is only required to work eight hours per day than will a man who is required to work ten hours. The less number of hours a man works, the more he can do in the hours that he does work. That, I believe, will be taken as true. This being so, it would not be fair to say that when we reduce the number of hours of work from ten hours to eight hours per day, the wages shall be reduced pro rata. Certainly, if a man only works a single hour a day, he can do more in that hour—make greater exertions—than if he had to work every hour of the day. So to adjust the wages pro rata according to the number of hours would not be fair.

[Remarks of Mr. Wilson.]

In this matter of manual labor I look only to the rights and interests of labor. In this country and in this age, as in other countries and in other ages, capital needs no champion. It will take care of itself, and will secure, if not the lion's share, at least its full share of profits in all departments of industry. * * * Whatever tends to dignify manual labor or to lighten its burdens, to increase its rewards or enlarge its knowledge, should receive our sympathies and command our support. Animated by these sentiments, I shall vote against the amendment and for the bill as it came from the representatives of the people.

[Senator BUCKALEW on the Sherman amendment.]

The operation of his (SHERMAN'S) amendment, therefore, when it comes to be applied practically, may be found to nullify the proposed law, or to embarrass the Government in the transaction of public business. * * *

Upon these considerations, in my judgment, it is perfectly clear that if we pass this bill at all we ought not to incumber and embarrass it with the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

[Actions had upon the bill.]

Amendment rejected. (See Congressional Globe, volume 68, June 24, 1868, pages 3424 and 3429, inclusive.)

The bill passed the Senate as it came from the House—yeas 26, nays 11.

On July 1, 1868, five days after the passage of the bill in the Senate, Mr. Conness submitted the following resolution in the Senate, which was unanimously adopted, to wit:

Resolved, That the President be requested to direct the heads of the several Departments of the Government to promulgate the law limiting the hours of labor recently enacted, with such regulations as will lead to an immediate compliance with the law.

[Extracts from the debates in the Senate on the question of the adoption of House resolution No. 47, which was incorporated in section 2 of the sundry civil bill, passed on the 18th of May, 1872. See volume 87, Congressional Globe, second session Forty-second Congress, page 124. See section 2, page 2, report.]

[Remarks of Mr. Morton.]

Mr. President, I desire to make one suggestion in reply to the Senator from Connecticut as to what was the understanding here when the eight-hour law passed. My recollection is that the Senator from Ohio sitting behind me [Mr. SHERMAN] offered an amendment to that bill for the purpose of testing the sense of the Senate as to whether there should be a full day's wages paid for eight hours' work, or only eight hours' labor paid for. My recollection is that the question was distinctly presented in that amendment, which was voted down by a very decided majority.

[Mr. Sumner on the same resolution.]

It is unquestionably an act of justice. These workmen are out of their money. Some of them are dead, and are represented by their families, and to them this small allowance is of very great importance. I do not think it advisable for us to take more time; I think we fairly owe the money, and therefore the sooner we pay it the better.

HOUSE.

[Remarks of Mr. Robeson.]

Mr. Speaker, I favor this law because it is only the enforcement of a statute which is written upon the statute-book of this country, and has been there for many years, and which, when it was passed with a full understanding of all its scope and meaning, and was a full notice to the country and all the Departments of the Government, and to everybody that was employed under it; therefore, sir, I am in favor, as long as it stands upon the statute-book, of executing it by all the powers of the Government.

[Remarks of Mr. Wright, of Pennsylvania.]

I did not introduce this bill, but I am its advocate, and I will stand by it from the beginning to the end, according to the law. In plain language, the law is written in these words:

"Eight hours shall constitute a day's work by all laborers, workmen, and mechanics who may be employed by or in behalf of the Government of the United States."

Is there any difficulty in putting a construction upon that language? It is written as plainly as the English language can express an idea, and it does me good when the ex-Secretary of the Navy rises in his place on this floor and states that while he had charge of that Department he carried out the law. Ordinarily we do not give men credit for carrying out the law, but here there has been an attempt to evade the law, and it has been wantonly done. Gentlemen must not tell me that the Supreme Court have decided that this law does not mean eight hours for a day's work.

All that the court has said is that a man who does the labor may take a special contract and is bound by it; that is what the court has decided. With regard to the character of this law, if it be not the law of the land, strike it from your statute-book, but do not evade it, do not attempt to get around it because it favors a class of men who have not the means to defend themselves in courts of justice or have not the money to come here and lobby this House for the purpose of protecting their own rights. Let the law stand or let the law be repealed. It has been here for a period of some twelve years, for I think the law was passed in 1868. It has been regarded as almost a dead letter upon the statute-book. I tell you that a construction against labor and laboring men in the manner in which this thing is done is wrong, and I tell you so before God and in the sight of all men that the law should be carried out and enforced.

Resolved, That according to the true intent and meaning of section 3733 of the Revised Statutes, all laborers, workmen, and mechanics employed by or on behalf of the Government shall hereafter receive a full day's pay for eight hours' work; and all heads of Departments, officers, and agents of the Government are hereby directed to enforce said law as herein interpreted.

Your committee, in view of the importance of this bill, insert the following additional matter:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

Your petitioners respectfully represent that they are laborers, workmen, and mechanics who now are or who have been employed by or on behalf of the Government of the United States subsequent to the 25th day of June, 1868, the date of the act constituting eight hours a day's work; that from the 1st of July, 1877, to December, 1883, they were compelled in all the navy-yards in the United States to work ten hours to earn their daily wages, or to earn what they were paid up to and since that time for eight hours' labor, or submit to a reduction of 25 per cent. in their wages. This we regard as a direct violation of the eight-hour law above referred to, and in direct conflict with the construction put upon the law by the United States Senate at the time of the passage of the law; also with the two several proclamations of President Grant, which were in the following words:

"Whereas the act of Congress approved June 25, 1868, constituted on and after that day eight hours a day's work for all laborers, workmen, and mechanics employed by or on behalf of the Government of the United States, and repealed all acts and parts of acts inconsistent therewith:

"Now therefore, I, Ulysses S. Grant, President of the United States, do hereby direct that from and after this date no reduction shall be made in the wages paid by the Government by the day to such laborers, workmen, and mechanics on account of such reduction of the hours of labor." (16 Statutes at Large, 1127.)

"Whereas the act of Congress approved June 25, 1868, constituted on and after that day eight hours a day's work for all laborers, workmen, and mechanics employed by or on behalf of the Government of the United States; and

"Whereas on the 19th day of May, in the year 1869, by executive proclamation it was directed that from and after that date no reduction should be made in the wages paid by the Government by the day to such laborers, workmen, and mechanics on account of such reduction of the hours of labor; and

"Whereas it is now represented to me that the act of Congress and the proclamation aforesaid have not been strictly observed by all the officers of the Government having charge of such laborers, workmen, and mechanics:

"Now therefore I, Ulysses S. Grant, President of the United States, do hereby again call attention to the act of Congress aforesaid, and direct all officers of the executive department of the Government having charge of the employment and payment of laborers, workmen, or mechanics employed by or on behalf of the Government of the United States to make no reduction in the wages paid by the Government by the day to such laborers, workmen, and mechanics on account of the reduction of the hours of labor." (17 Statutes at Large, 955.)

It is also in direct conflict with the act of 18th May, 1872, which is in the following words:

"That the proper accounting officers be, and hereby are, authorized and required, in the settlement of all accounts for the services of laborers, workmen, and mechanics employed by or on behalf of the Government of the United States, between the 25th day of June, 1868, the date of the act constituting eight hours a day's work for all such laborers, workmen, and mechanics, and the 19th day of May, 1869, the date of the proclamation of the President concerning such pay, to settle and pay for the same, without reduction on account of reduction of hours of labor by said act, when it shall be made to appear that such was the sole cause of the reduction of wages, and a sufficient sum for said purpose is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated." (17 Statutes at Large, 134.)

As well as the joint resolution of the House of Representatives, as follows:

"[In the Senate of the United States,' May 10, 1878. Read twice and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor. Joint resolution to provide for the enforcement of the eight-hour law.]

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That according to the true intent and meaning of the act of Congress approved June 25, 1868, entitled 'An act constituting eight hours a legal day's work for all laborers, workmen, and mechanics employed by or on behalf of the Government of the United States,' eight hours constitute a day's work for all such laborers, workmen, and mechanics; and while said act remains upon the statute-book no reduction shall be made in the wages paid by the Government, by the day, to such laborers, workmen, and mechanics on account of the reduction of the hours of labor; and that all heads of departments, officers, and agents of the Government are hereby directed to enforce said law as long as the same is unrepealed.

"Passed the House of Representatives May 9, 1878.

"Attest: GEO. M. ADAMS, Clerk."

We, your humble petitioners, further respectfully represent that we feel that a great injury has been done us in requiring us to perform one-quarter more work in a calendar day than the law of the land required. We feel that we have been deprived of one-fourth of our wages by the action of the officers of the Government whose duty it was to enforce and obey the law in its letter and spirit, and we come to your honorable body as the only tribunal to which we have access, feeling that your honorable body will grant us simple justice. We do not ask a gratuity; we only ask what is honestly and justly our due, and which is now being withheld from us, as we think and fully believe, in violation of a solemn act of Congress which was intended for our benefit.

If we were to have all that the law allows us it would be but a pittance, and scarcely sufficient to enable us to provide the bare necessities of life for our families; and to deprive us of any part of it, while it would not be felt by those in affluent circumstances, is a serious matter to us. We could not refuse to work; that was to starve; and we preferred to take what we could get, render faithful performance of our services, and trust to your honorable body to do us justice in the future. We therefore do humbly but most earnestly pray that your honorable body will allow us the privilege of presenting our several claims to a competent tribunal to be adjudicated upon the basis that the full price of a day's work shall be paid for eight hours' labor, or that your honorable body will grant as such other relief as in the opinion of your honorable body will secure to your petitioners substantial justice in the premises; and your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

ROCK ISLAND ARSENAL.

——, ——, 188—.

To comply with the requirements of General Orders No. 53, Adjutant-General's Office, Washington, D. C., June 1, 1877, a day's work at this arsenal, when the length of the day will permit, is made to consist of ten hours; but to conform more strictly to the ruling custom in this vicinity as is required by law, one half hour of this time is allowed to the workmen for the longer walk to their work than is necessary in the cities, making the hours of labor 9½ hours per day. In winter, when the hours of daylight will not permit 9½ hours of labor, the number of hours fixed by orders from time to time will constitute a full day's work.

When a workman is employed only a part of a day he will be allowed for such part of a day's work the number of hours he works divided by the number of hours that constitute a day's work at the time. Special workmen, such as foreman, guards, firemen, shop attendants, etc., whose duties require their presence more hours than other workmen, will be allowed only one day's labor for the full number of hours of service required of them in each twenty-four hours, and their wages shall be fixed accordingly. We, the undersigned, agree to the above.

Personally appeared before me, a clerk of the county court in and for the county of Rock Island and State of Illinois aforesaid, Patrick J. Carey, who, being duly sworn, upon his oath doth say that he was employed at the United States arsenal at Rock Island, Ill., during the seven years from A. D. 1877 to A. D. 1884; that he as well as other employés at the said arsenal were required to sign the contract, a copy of which is hereto attached and marked Exhibit A, or get no employment at said arsenal; that he did, with other employés, sign the said contract under protest, knowing at the time of signing the same as aforesaid that eight hours were a legal day's work in Government employ, and that William Channon, a foreman at said arsenal, gave notice to the affiant, as well as other employés, that his instructions were to retain none of the employés that would not sign the aforesaid contract, and that any refusing so to do would be immediately discharged from the Government employ, and that he did sign the aforesaid contract under protest and continued to work at said arsenal under said contract until the night of April 2, A. D. 1884, believing that the United States Congress would give the benefit of the eight-hour law out of which he and the other employés were wronged.

That he has heretofore joined with other employés, and forwarded to the honorable Secretary of War, in a protest against the action of Col. D. W. Flagler, commandant at said Rock Island arsenal.

Personally appeared before me, a clerk of the county and State aforesaid, Robert Bennett, who, being duly sworn upon his oath, does say that he was employed at the United States arsenal at Rock Island, Ill., during the years from A. EXHIBIT B.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., February 7, 1888.

To all whom it may concern:

This is to certify that at a meeting of the employés of the League Island navy-yard held at Philadelphia, on February 22, 1878, I was duly elected as their representative to proceed to Washington for the purpose of getting Congress to pass a law to enforce the "eight-hour law," which had been violated by the honorable Secretary of the Navy, at that time, and also to claim extra compensation for the two hours worked per day in violation of the eight-hour law.

At that time the Boston, New York, Washington, and Norfolk navy-yards sent representatives to work in conjunction with myself. By proxy I was authorized to act for the employés of the Kittery and Mare Island (California) navy-yards, also Frankford arsenal, Philadelphia, and the arsenal at Rock Island, Ill., and finally was authorized to represent all the navy-yards.

I would state this committee worked at every session of Congress during the following three years, without obtaining the legislation that they asked for, when all but myself became disheartened and came to the conclusion that Congress passed the eight-hour law for the benefit of Government employés, but would do nothing to make the heads of Departments of the Government enforce the law after they had violated it.

Finding that Congress would take no action in regard to the enforcement of the law, after a three years' trial, I brought the matter to the attention of Presidents Garfield and Arthur and their Secretaries of the Army and Navy, and the great help that I received from Hon. A. C. HARMER, after working for two years more, succeeded in getting ex-Secretary of the Navy William E. Chandler to enforce the law, which was done on or about March 26, 1883; about ten months afterward succeeded in getting ex-Secretary of War Robert E. Lincoln to enforce the law. During all this time I, as the representative of these employés, protested against the violation of the law, and claimed compensation for the extra hours worked in excess of eight hours per day. I would state that at the navy-yards during the violation of the law the employés were compelled to work six months in the year eight hours per day and six months ten hours per day, and were paid the same rate of wages for eight hours' work per day as they received for ten hours' work per day, and at the navy-yards the employés signed no contracts; they had to work according to orders received or be discharged.

I was informed at the arsenals by the employés that they worked ten hours per day the whole year, during the violation of the law, and were compelled to sign contracts by the officers in charge or be forthwith discharged.

When elected to represent the Government employés I was rated as a laborer on the rolls at navy-yard, League Island, Philadelphia, Pa. Hon. HENRY W. BLAIR, United States Senator, ought to remember me well, as I had to appear before the committee several times on this matter; I also requested him to present in 1884 a resolution to pay Government employés for holidays, which was passed and approved January 6, 1885; also at last session of Congress requested him to present a resolution to pay Government employés for Decoration Day, which was passed and approved.

Hon. A. C. HARMER assisted me in the eight-hour business and can vouch for my statement.

On this 8th day of February, 1888, personally appeared before me, a notary public in and for the aforesaid District, Richard Emmons and Joseph M. Padgett, of Washington, D. Davis, of Philadelphia, Pa., who represented the League Island yard and other yards, did present the case by way of protest to the Secretary of the Navy, and also presented the matter to Congress; that the House of Representatives did, in 1878, pass a favorable resolution on the subject, but that during the administration of President Hayes no change of Secretary Thompson's order compelling the said employés to work ten hours was promulgated at this yard, and the men were compelled to work ten hours per day until the order of Secretary Chandler fixing the time of a day's work at eight hours; further affiants saith not.

I, Edward H. Rogers, being duly sworn, do depose and say that I am a citizen of the State of Massachusetts, residing in the city of Chelsea in said State; that I am temporarily in the city of Washington, D. C.; that I am a ship-joiner by trade; that I have worked in the navy-yard at Charlestown, Mass., at intervals for twenty-six years now last past; that I am here as the representative of the workingmen of said navy-yard who have claims for overtime under the eight-hour law.

I further state that on or about March 1, 1878, at Charlestown, in the said State, a meeting of the employés of the Government in said yard was held for the purpose of sending a delegate or representative to Washington to protest to the officers of the Government here against the action of the commandant of the yard in requiring the men to work ten hours per calendar day without increase of pay, when, by the act of June 25, 1868, they were only required to work eight hours for a full day's work, and to take such measures as would secure the enforcement of the eight-hour law.

I further state that I was secretary of that meeting; that Mr. Samuel C. Hunt, of Charlestown, Mass., an employé of the yard, was chosen as a delegate to perform that service; that he proceeded to Washington on or about the 9th day of the same month for that purpose, and worked diligently to that end for nearly three months, and that I assisted in raising some $300 to pay his expenses on that business and maintain his family.

I further state that he, in company with delegates from the other yards, had several interviews with the Secretary of the Navy, but that they were unsuccessful, as the increased hours were continued without corresponding payment during the five summer seasons from 1878 to 1882, inclusive. An interview which the delegation had with President Hayes brought no relief, and they finally turned their efforts towards Congress.

It further appears that a joint resolution declaratory of the intention of Congress concerning the eight-hour law passed the House of Representatives through their action on May 9, 1878. It declared that "eight hours should constitute a day's work," and that "no reduction should be made in the wages on account of the reduction of the hours of labor." Pending its consideration by the Senate, Mr. Hunt returned to his home, the other delegates doing the same, with the exception of Mr. Jacob M. Davis, the delegate from the League Island yard. Mr. Davis remained in Washington as the authorized agent of naval stations and arsenals of the whole country.

The following matter was also filed before the committee:

Now as to the amount involved in case this bill should pass. Of course we have no basis upon which we can estimate or base the amount with any positive degree of accuracy. But the act of Congress approved May 8, 1872 (see U. S. Stat. at Large, page 134), provided for the payment of all sums deducted from the pay of laborers, workmen, and mechanics, in consequence of the reduction in the hours of labor from the 25th day of June, 1868, until the 19th of May, 1869, a period of eleven months and twenty days; and, according to the estimate of the Third Auditor of the Treasury, it took about $300,000 to pay the men for that period. (See official letter of that officer to Senator Harvey, of Kansas, dated February 25, 1875, in reply to an inquiry as to the amount involved in the passage of a similar bill to this, then pending in the Senate). Taking this sum as the basis for the period of, say, one year (for it is within ten days of that time), and supposing that about the same number of men were employed by the Government during that year as have been on an average for the period since that time in which these parties claim pay, which is six months in each year from July, 1877, to the 1st of January, 1884, a period aggregating four years (see the order of Secretary Thompson, under President Hayes, dated June 30, 1877), and it would require about $1,200,000.

But according to the statement of the auditor there had been but $22,063.75 paid up to the 25th day of July, 1875, a period of nearly three years after the passage of the act authorizing payment as aforesaid; and the strong probability is that not one-half of that sum has ever been paid out on those claims. From this we may reasonably say that should this bill pass, not half of the claims would be presented within the period named in the bill for presenting these claims. But suppose it takes double or treble that amount, what has the amount to do with it if the claim is a just one? And it must be borne in mind that these claimants are not asking Congress to determine the justness of their claims; they only ask what is almost universally granted to capitalists and corporations, and that is that they may go before a competent tribunal and prove the justness of their claims if they can.

One other matter as to the facts in the case. The eight-hour law was passed on the 25th of June, 1868, but was entirely ignored by the officers of the Government who had charge of the employment of the men named in the act, either by requiring them to work ten hours to earn their daily wages, or submit to a reduction of their wages to correspond with the reduction in the hours of labor if they only worked eight hours per day. This state of things went on until the 19th of May, 1869, when President Grant issued his proclamation prohibiting any reduction of pay in consequence of the reduction of the hours of labor; and still things went on in the same way until 11th of May, 1872, when the President issued a second proclamation calling attention to the first and repeating it. Meantime complaint was made to Congress, petitions were sent in, and bills were introduced with the view of restraining the officers of the Government from violating the law, which finally resulted in the passage of section 2 of the act making appropriations for that current or fiscal year, requiring the accounting officers of the Treasury to resettle with the men, and to pay them all sums which had been withheld from them in consequence of the reduction of the hours of labor between the 25th day of June, 1868, the date of the passage of the eight-hour bill, and the 19th day of May, 1869, the date of the President's first proclamation, a period, as before stated, of about eleven months and twenty days; but this act made no provision for payment of the sums withheld from the date of the President's proclamation to the passage of the act, to wit, from the 19th day of May, 1869, to the 18th of May, 1872. But during this time General Grant enforced the law in the different navy-yards of the United States, so that from the date of his first proclamation to the end of his administration the employés of the navy-yards were only required to work eight hours to earn their daily wages. But on the coming in of the administration of President Hayes, Secretary Thompson, Secretary of the Navy, issued the following order, dated, as will be seen, on the 30th day of June, 1877:

"[General Order, No. 227.]

"NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, June 30, 1877.

"The following decision of the Supreme Court of the United States is published for the information of the Navy:

* * * * * * * *

"Under this construction of the law regulating public labor, given by the Supreme Court of the United States, the Department has fixed the rate of labor for mechanics, foremen, leading men, and laborers on the basis of ten hours a day. All workmen electing to labor only eight hours per day will receive a proportionate reduction of their wages.

"R. W. THOMPSON,
"Secretary of the Navy."

Thus requiring the superintendents of different navy-yards to employ the men on the basis of ten hours for each day's work, and if the men chose to work two hours less they were to receive less wages. Under this order the men were employed until the 21st of March, 1878, when this order was rescinded or revoked, and the following order was issued:

"[Circular No. 8.]

"NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, March 21, 1878.

"The following is hereby substituted, to take effect from this date, for the circular of October 25, 1877, in relation to the working hours at the several navy-yards and shore stations:

"The working hours will be, from March 21 to September 21, form 7 a. m. to 6 p. m.; from September 22 to March 20, from 7.40 a. m. to 4.30 p. m., with the usual intermission of one hour for dinner.

The Department will contract for the labor of mechanics, foremen, leadingmen, and laborers on the basis of eight hours a day. All workmen electing to labor ten hours a day will receive a proportionate increase of their wages.

The commandants will notify the men employed, or to be employed, of these conditions, and they are at liberty to continue or accept employment under them or not.

R. W. THOMPSON,
Secretary of the Navy.

So that it will be readily seen that under the last-named order the Government hired the men on a basis that eight hours constituted a day's work, and agreed if they worked ten hours per day it would pay them a corresponding increase of wages. Now, the fact is that the men did work ten hours per day until the date of the following order:

[Circular to the yards.]

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, March 23, 1883.

The Department confirms its telegram to you of the 20th instant, which was in the following words: "Continue the present eight hours of labor until otherwise ordered."

The hours of labor should be from 8 to 12 m. and from 1 to 5 p. m.

W. E. CHANDLER,
Secretary of the Navy.

And that they have never been paid a single dollar of increase on account of such overwork, and now they ask to go to the Court of Claims and establish their claims. As it has been before stated, those men only worked half of the year under the orders of June 30, 1877, and of March 21, 1878, ten hours a day. They worked from the 21st of September to the 21st of March eight hours per day, and were paid the price of a day's work on the basis named in the order, namely, that of eight hours; but they then worked from the 21st of March to the 21st of September ten hours a day without increase of pay, although the honorable Secretary of the Navy, in the order above named, specifically agreed that they should be paid a corresponding increase whenever they worked ten hours per day. So that it appears that the order of the honorable Secretary was entirely ignored by the officers having the work in charge, and the Government owes these men by special agreement for this overwork in all these cases named.

Mr. PAYNE. I submit to the Senator that he has no authority for the averment in the report that the men were compelled to work or starve.

Mr. BLAIR. I have authority for it, having draughted the report; and the facts upon which I base that authority are, in effect, that the Government has the eight-hour law on the statute-book; the Government is under the necessity of having work; men come and tender their services, and the subordinate, not the Government itself, but the Government subordinate, without authority and in violation of the direction from his principal, says to a laborer asking for work, and who has to receive it, or some other laborer is to receive it, "You may have employment on condition that you work ten hours instead of eight for the same sum of money to which you are entitled under the law for eight hours' labor." The man, to be sure, in one sense, has power to refuse. He may go elsewhere; he may hunt for labor somewhere else; but the next man comes under precisely the same circumstances, and asks for employment in the same way, and is met with precisely the same unjust and wrongful demand on the part of the subagent, in violation of his instructions, who claims to represent the Government. So, unless this man submits to the wrongful demand, he has to step aside, and so of the next, and so on until all the laborers of the country capable of performing this work shall have presented themselves, and all of them have in turn declined to labor because of this wrongful act on the part of the subagent or subordinate of the United States. The result would be that the Government could get no labor whatever. Further, that is the position in which the Government would be left if these men did not labor, and thus the subordinate would be put in a position to violate the law and to repeal the action of Congress.

But I say that it was actual compulsion to these men who asked for work. It was compulsion in this sense, that without work they must starve, and that it was, as we all know, practically impossible for men to obtain labor, even including the labor of the Government, for everybody wants to obtain employment. The country many of these years was not only full, but abounding in tramps, and among those were many honest men who were not able to obtain work, and here was this vast amount of employment, with the best of pay, ready pay, in behalf of the United States, and these people asking for it, and asking for it on the terms laid down in the law; and I say in a most just and proper sense, as the report states, that these men were obliged, in order to work at all, in order to supply the necessities of their families, to accept it upon the illegal terms which were forced upon them or go without the labor that was to give them the means of life.

They protested; they said that was not according to law; they carried their complaints to the heads of Departments; they sent their committees to Congress; they asked for assistance; they asked for redress; and time after time this continual effort to secure a proper construction of the law during these eight years was unavailing. That they were right and that the Government was wrong is sufficiently demonstrated, as I said before, by the direct language of the statute, by the contemporaneous explanations and the construction of its language, as shown in the debates and by the actual votes upon propositions to amend the law, and on a proposition offered by a Senator not now present to so amend the law that it should specifically provide that for eight hours they were only to receive that proportion of compensation for a day's work in the vicinity where they rendered the labor that eight hours was to the ten or twelve hours' ordinary labor constituting a day's work outside of the Government employment.

Now, Mr. President, I shall speak just a moment upon the legal construction made of this act during the time it has been on the statute-book. There have been two decisions, at least, but two of which I have knowledge, which have been made by the Supreme Court during this period of time bearing upon the law. One is that of the United States vs. Martin, which was cited by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] the other day as holding that where a man worked and received a compensation that was illegally forced upon him, or for which he was compelled to labor illegally beyond the eight hours in order to receive it—that having received that he was precluded from any further application for the excess. That is not the law; that is not the decision.

Mr. PLATT. Will the Senator permit me a moment?

Mr. BLAIR. Yes, sir.

Mr. PLATT. That certainly was the case where he was told that if he did not continue to work the twelve hours at the price he had been theretofore receiving he could not have employment.

Mr. BLAIR. Certainly; they were notified by those they were working under that they must work the ten or twelve hours or be discharged. That condition was imposed upon those already being employed and under contract with the Government at the time of the enactment of the law as well as upon those who applied for employment de novo.

His decision is of course good law only to the extent of the facts which it covers. I read those facts and conclusions in the debate the other night. I will read them once more to show that the scope of the decision does not cover any such construction of the law as is claimed by the Senator from Missouri. These are the facts:

In the year 1873 the claimant made a formal application in writing to the Fourth Auditor of the Treasury for arrears of pay claimed as due him under the second section of the act of May 18, 1872 (17 Statutes, 134), between the 25th of June, 1868, and the 19th of May, 1869, on account of his said employment.

The first act referred to is that of Congress requiring compensation to be paid where over the eight hours' labor had been exacted for the ordinary compensation after the law of Congress was passed wherever facts existed or similar facts existed which now exist, and to redress injury under and by virtue of the bill that is now before Congress, showing that Congress so construed their own act of 1868 by requiring in express terms the excess be paid to these men. This man came forward and made his claim under that law.

Mr. GEORGE. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. BLAIR. Let me finish this statement of facts.

Mr. GEORGE. Does the Senator refer to the act of 1872?

Mr. BLAIR. This man made his claim under that act, that his services were rendered between June 25, 1868, and May, 1869, or some day of May, 1869. Congress passed an act in 1872——

Mr. GEORGE. I have that before my mind now.

Mr. BLAIR. Yes, you have that before you. Congress passed an act in 1872 directing that where the employé had worked more than the eight hours for his compensation he should be paid for the excess between the date of the enactment of the law of June 25, 1868, and the period—some eleven months later—of the proclamation, in May, 1869. This man, after the enactment of the law of 1872, expressly affirming his right to such compensation, made his claim to the auditor, and these are the facts——

Mr. GEORGE. Are there any more than two acts of Congress on the subject, the act of 1868 and that of 1872?

Mr. BLAIR. I have no knowledge of any other. There was a proclamation of Grant, in 1869; there was an act of June 25, 1868, the original act; and then there was another act by Congress, in May, 1872, directing the excess of labor to be paid for between the date of the original act and the proclamation of May, 1869.

Mr. GEORGE. The act of 1868?

Mr. BLAIR. May 19, 1869, is the date of the proclamation of President Grant.

Mr. GEORGE. And the law you read from the Revised Statutes is the act of 1868?

Mr. BLAIR. Yes; and in the report I have read you will see the number of the section in the Revised Statutes.

Mr. GEORGE. I want that.

Mr. BLAIR. It is section 3738 of the Revised Statutes. That is the original act. The other act was a provision in an appropriation bill. It was approved May 18, 1872. Now for the facts in the case before the Supreme Court:

In the year 1873 the claimant made a formal application, in writing, to the Fourth Auditor of the Treasury for arrears of pay, claimed as due him under the second section of the act of May 18, 1872 (17 Statutes, 134) between the 25th of June, 1868, and the 19th of May, 1869—

That is the date of President Grant's proclamation—on account of his said employment.

Now this is what I wish to call the attention of the Senate to:

The Auditor thereupon stated the account, and allowed the claimant $295.63, which was admitted by the Second Comptroller; and that amount was paid to the claimant, who receipted for the same, in writing, in full of the account.

The court below dismissed the petition, but on a subsequent day of the term made an order vacating the judgment, and directing, for the purpose of an appeal, a pro forma judgment to be entered in favor of the claimant in the sum of $1,019.49.

The Senate will observe that here is a controversy arising after all the facts existed which fix the rights of the parties, and that this controversy is adjudicated between them, and that the claimant accepts the adjudication or award; and that, under all the principles of law, of course, is an end of the litigation. That is all there is of the case. The court decided that a man may make a special agreement or he may settle a controversy, and that is all there is in it, so far as that decision is concerned.

But, Mr. President, the bill before the Senate is designed to give to those who have not by actual litigation adjusted their claims, and to give them beyond all controversy the right which the original act gave to them to receive compensation for this excess, and the first section of the act is designed to be so explicit upon that subject that there can be no controversy. To be sure, if a man has raised the question, if he has submitted to the jurisdiction of a court, of a tribunal, of a referee, and there has been an award made in good faith, and without any imposition or fraud he has accepted that as an end of the litigation, as an end of the controversy both of law and of fact, he should, I suppose, be concluded; but this bill is not designed to reach a case of that kind.

There are very few instances of that sort. So far as I know this is the only instance. I am not aware that there has ever been a litigation, except this one litigation, and nobody is bound by it save this single party, and if there were others I think it would be the duty of Congress to go further and to enact a law conferring a remedy for this equitable claim; for nobody can doubt, it seems to me, the correctness of the later construction of President Cleveland, and of President Arthur in the last part of his administration, and of Secretary Chandler, and of Secretary Whitney, and of Secretary Lincoln also, who had his attention called to this subject and whose letter affirming his views upon the matter in favor of these laborers is to be found in the report of the committee, which has been ordered to be printed as part of my remarks.

There is one other decision, and only one other decision, and that is what is known as the 15 per cent. cases. One of the ingenious subterfuges to which executive officers resorted to prevent the American people from having their way was invented, what are known as the 15 per cent. cases, arising under the contracts decided upon in the case of the United States vs. Driscoll, in 6 Otto, page 421. These are the only cases which have come before the Supreme Court.

In this latter case the United States furnished the money to perform the work; furnished the machinery, and generally the plant wherewith it was performed, but let the contract to perform the labor to a contractor, and he hired the labor, using the money advanced to him by the United States to pay the workmen, laborers, and mechanics employed by him.

It was finally held, there being no actual privity of contract between the workmen and this 15 per cent. contractor, that the United States was not liable; and he did succeed in evading the law in that way. The court has so decided, and of course this bill furnished no remedy as against those who had no privity of contract in their relation to the United States. That class of cases for quite a number of years covered a great mass of the Department work of the country in the construction of public buildings, and I suppose that was done in the way of the improvement of our rivers and harbors, and all that which was contract labor where there was no privity between the employés and the United States, and consequently this bill does not touch them at all, and it is not expected to do so.

It was suggested the other day by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] that the propelling power behind this bill was simply a parcel of claim agents, or very largely so. He intimated that there was nobody but claim agents interested in the matter. During all the years this question has been pending before the Committee on Education and Labor I have never heard of but one agent, and he is a lawyer here in this city, of eminence and respectability, as I am informed, and he has never been before the committee but in a single instance.

Since that suggestion of the Senator I have had placed in my hands one of the petitions, a petition from the Norfolk navy-yard, of between four and five hundred employés, and those who bring it to me say there is no claim agent whatever representing these men. I have received since the public prints assailed this (as some parties assail every claim against the Government of any importance as being simply for the enrichment of claim agents) a large number of affidavits from men having claims in different parts of the country, in which they assert that they have employed no claim agents, that they are dealing directly with the Government, and I think it is substantially true that these claims are now in the hands of the men who rendered the service. Doubtless there may be here and there a claim agent interested, but that there is anything in these claims or the existing ownership of these claims that would justify the United States in repudiating an honest or an equitable debt I do not believe. It has not come to my knowledge. I have not heard even remote suggestions of it, save only this general talk to which I have alluded.

The matter is a simple one. I can not make it any plainer. It is an appeal to the equity of Congress, and I hope that the bill will pass.

Mr. VEST. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri. [Putting the question.] The ayes appear to have it.

Mr. BLAIR. I call for a division.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 21, noes 19.

Mr. BLAIR and Mr. STEWART called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. BLAIR. I should like to say a word to the Senate, because it is not a matter to exhibit any feeling about, and I think they will see we ought to go further in this direction——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. BLAIR. The only available opportunity for the consideration of this matter in the other House will be on Wednesday night, and we must pass it before then or let it go for the session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will suspend. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. HOAR. I ask that the vote may be again taken by a division.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the vote may be again taken by a division. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The question being again put, there were—ayes 19——

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. BLAIR. May I be permitted to say a word.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the Senator from New Hampshire proceeding? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BLAIR. I withdraw the call for the yeas and nays. I think it will lead simply to that sort of controversy over this bill which will be profitless, and I do not want that. I have stated to the Senate the necessity of our acting in season so as to get the bill to the House by Wednesday, and I will withdraw the call and ask as a matter of courtesy to these men, at least, that we may dispose of the bill to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the withdrawal of the call for the yeas and nays? The Chair hears none. The order is reconsidered. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After thirty minutes spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, July 17, 1888, at 12 o'clock m.

THE TARIFF.

Mr. MILLS. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of bills raising revenue; but before submitting the motion I want to try if we can not reach some conclusion as to the limit of debate upon the pending schedule and amendments.

Mr. REED. I have an impression that it is not necessary. I rather think we shall be ready for a vote on the free-wool question very soon. I do not think there will be an hour's debate required on this side.

Mr. MILLS. Still we had better try to fix some limit to the debate. I move, pending the motion to go into Committee of the Whole, that all debate on the pending schedule and amendments be closed at 2 o'clock.

Mr. REED. I do not think you had better say the entire schedule and amendments.

Mr. MILLS. Well, we have debated it over and over again, and this will not preclude the offering of such amendments as gentlemen may desire to present.

Mr. REED. The proposition originally was in reference to the free-wool clause. That can be voted on after some little discussion this morning, and then if there are amendments which need explanation on other points in connection with the schedule—and I am free to say I do not know of anything that will take up any great amount of time—but if there are such amendments and gentlemen want an opportunity of explaining them, I think it only proper that they should be allowed to do so. I do not know that many will be offered.

Mr. MILLS. I do not either; but I will move at this time simply that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the pending tariff bill.

Mr. REED. I think that is the shortest course.

Mr. MILLS. Pending the motion I yield for a moment to my colleague from Texas, who desires to submit a request.

IMPROVEMENT OF BRAZOS RIVER, TEXAS.

Mr. CRAIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of bill (H. R. 10165) for improving the mouth of the Brazos River, Texas, and put it upon its passage. This involves no appropriation of money; it has been read once and has been reported unanimously favorably by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. I ask, therefore, that its reading be dispensed with to save time and that it be put upon its passage.

Mr. SPRINGER. I would like to have it read.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to the right to object.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. BLAND. Is that a privileged matter?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The gentleman from Texas has asked unanimous consent to consider the bill.

Mr. BLAND. I demand the regular order. Let these unanimous consents come in after the tariff bill is disposed of.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to further consider revenue bills.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

THE TARIFF.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to further consider the bill the title of which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue.

The CHAIRMAN. The pending question is to strike out section 3 of this bill.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. Mr. Chairman, I am fully aware that my amendment to take wool from the free-list will not only fail, but that it will not receive serious consideration. The caucus has so decreed, and I, in the name of my constituents, can only protest.

However much difference of opinion may exist in the minds of the majority in regard to the various items in the bill, there is little or none as to wool. This unanimity is strange and recent. Until last December a large proportion of the Democratic members of the House thought they were in favor of a duty on imported wool, but on reading the President's message they found that they were unacquainted with their own views. To show the change of front, I will not insult common sense by calling it change of opinion, I beg leave to read the resolutions of the Legislature of Ohio, the Democrats being in the majority, January 23, 1884:

Whereas the Forty-seventh Congress reduced the tariff on imported wool, against the protest of every wool-grower of the State of Ohio and the United States; and

Whereas the said reduction of tariff on imported wool discriminates against the wool-growers of the West, in favor of the manufacturers of the East, thereby compelling the wool-growers of the West to compete with cheap wool of foreign countries, to their very great injury; and

Whereas that tariff was reasonable and not too high before the reduction, and stands now at a rate so low as to injuriously affect that large and respectable class of people who have devoted themselves to wool-growing; and

Whereas an Ohio Congressman has already introduced a bill in the House of Representatives of the Forty-eighth Congress to restore the tariff on wool as it stood prior to the recent reduction, which should be passed at the earliest time possible: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, That our Senators in Congress be, and are hereby, instructed and our Representatives requested to use all honorable means and vote for the bill to restore the tariff on wool as it stood prior to the recent reduction, and that the governor be requested to send a copy of this resolution to each of our Senators and Representatives at Washington.

These resolutions received the vote of every Democratic member of the Legislature then present.

Moreover, on the 25th day of June, 1884, the Ohio Democratic State convention, which selected delegates to the national convention which nominated Grover Cleveland for President, adopted unanimously as the third resolution in its platform the following:

That the just demands of the wool-growers of Ohio and the country for an equitable readjustment of the duties on wool (unjustly reduced by a Republican Congress), so that this industry shall be fully and equally favored with other industries, ought to be complied with, and we indorse the action of the Democratic members from Ohio in their efforts to accomplish this result.

A like resolution was passed by the Democratic State convention of Ohio August 20, 1885.

The reduction of the tariff on wool in 1883 by the Forty-seventh Congress was denounced on the stump and in the press by the Democrats of Ohio, and by Democrats generally, as a wrong and an outrage.

On the 16th day of May, 1888, a Democratic State convention for Ohio, meeting for the purpose of selecting delegates to renominate Grover Cleveland, passed without a dissenting voice, I believe, the following resolution:

We approve the Mills tariff bill as the practical expression of the Democratic party, and request our Representatives in Congress to give it cordial support.

This Mills bill is the one now under discussion, and puts wool on the free-list. The reduction of 1883 was 1 cent and a fraction per pound. The Mills bill takes off all the remaining duty, substantially 10 cents per pound, and, so far as wool is concerned, establishes free trade, pure and simple.

If the law of 1883 was an outrage, what is the bill of 1888?

In view of the fact that no new facts have been discovered since 1883 bearing upon this subject, and absolutely not a new argument suggested or a new idea advanced, the people will inquire whether the leaders of the Democratic party were sincere and honest in 1883, 1884, 1885, and 1886, or whether they are now, or whether they merely sought votes then and are pursuing the same purpose now.

It will be remembered, also, that the convention which nominated Grover Cleveland for President in 1884 denounced the Republican party for the action to which I have referred, using this language:

The Republican party has depleted the revenues of American agriculture, an industry followed by half our people.

Again that convention resolved:

The Democratic party is pledged to revise the tariff in the spirit of fairness to all interests, but in making reduction of taxes it is not proposed to injure any domestic industries, but rather to promote their growth.

This bill is a change of direction in that regard, and I must think, Mr. Chairman, that it is one of the accidents which are occurring nowadays. It was not until last December that the Democratic members of this House had the opinion they have now on this question. Up to December last some, I know, of the Democratic members of this House were acting under pledges to restore the tarift on wool, pledges exacted from them by their constituents; but now those same members are here with changed minds in regard to this question.

Mr. Chairman, I protest against the provision in this bill in regard to wool. I protest against it in the interest of the farmer himself. But I have observed that when this question has been presented in this House it has been proclaimed and argued here that the tariff has lessened the price of wool. Not only did the Committee on Ways and Means of the Forty-ninth Congress report such a proposition, but over and over again it has been asserted in this House by men in favor of this bill that the higher the protection the lower wool has gone. If that be so, Mr. Chairman, it not only answers the argument in favor of free trade, but justifies the appeal I now make. I appeal not only in behalf of the farmers that this provision may be stricken out, but also in behalf of the consumers of wool products, the poor men who buy hats and blankets, the men who have excited the sympathy of our friends so much. If it be true that a tariff on wool, as gentlemen on the other side have asserted without stint, has reduced the price of wool, then I say do not take off the duty and thereby increase the cost of blankets, the cost of woolens, the cost of woolen hats, concerning the price of which our friends seem to be so greatly exercised.

Until 1867 the larger part of wool used in this country was grown abroad. Then the tariff enactment was made that put wool on a different footing; and from 22,000,000 sheep the number had increased in 1882 to 50,000,000, and from a clip of wool of 60,000,000 in 1867 there was a clip in 1883 of 350,000,000 pounds—an increase not only in the number of sheep, but a still greater increase in the proportionate number of pounds produced.

The price of wool depends upon the relation of supply and demand, as does that of other commodities, and inasmuch as a steady, reasonable protection assures safety to producers, as against foreign efforts to destroy an industry by a temporary reduction of prices, it was to have been expected that the law of 1867 should, as it did, give confidence to wool-growers and cause an increased production. This result followed to such an extent that, notwithstanding the vast increase of foreign production, owing to the opening up of the new cheap lands of Australia and New Zealand, our own flock-masters furnished nearly all the wool required by our people, excepting coarse carpet wools, up to the time of the change in the tariff by the law of 1883, notwithstanding the constantly-increasing demand.

This increase of production doubtless had its part in the following decline in prices. Such decline is looked for by protectionists as the result of protection legislation, and I may say is always found when such legislation touches articles which may be produced in sufficient quantities here to supply our demands.

The tariff is a shield against outside attacks made to clear the field with a view to ulterior increase of prices, and under its cover home competition is fostered until the final result is cheap goods to the consumer, fair and only fair profits to the producer, satisfactory remuneration to the laborer, retention of capital at home, and the industrial independence of our country.

The whole theory and reasoning of free trade involves the idea that tariff is tax, and that only.

Applied to tea, coffee, and such other articles as are unproducable in this country, the statement is true and the theory correct, as they are also when applied to sugar chiefly produced abroad. In such cases competition can not exist—I mean our country can offer none; but when all home demands may be met by home supply, competition at first lessens the tax and finally neutralizes it, so that the commodity is as low in price as though on the free-list, perhaps lower, and often sells in the market at a price less than the duty itself. The free-trader, however, never changes the formula of his cry, "A tariff is a tax." "High tariff is a high tax." "The tariff increases the price of commodities precisely to the extent of the amount of the impost." In the cases suggested by me heretofore the statements are absolutely correct; but in those cases to which protectionists invoke tariff laws, they are absolutely false. Then, it may be inquired, what is the need of protection laws if prices are not increased?

Please bear in mind that I have not said that prices are never increased by tariffs. At first they always are; but in the end prices are less under a system of protection than they are when fixed by foreign producers.

Iron, steel, woolen, and cotton fabrics are unquestionably lower than if they were unprotected. Take the tariff off those articles and they would be cheaper for a time, so cheap that our mills could only run at a loss and soon would stop. Then prices would go up and still up, for even free-traders believe in "buying cheap and selling dear." If our mills have not rusted out and our artisans lost their cunning, high prices will stimulate the restarting of the mills; but an immediate drop in the market will silence them and ruin their owners. We need the tariff, therefore, as a governor, literally as a protector, not as a tax nor an increaser of prices under normal and honest conditions.

The present tariff on wool would be a sufficient protection to wool-growing interest if its provisions were not systematically and dishonestly disregarded by the admission of foreign partially manufactured wools under the names of "ring waste" and "wool tops" at 10 cents per pound, instead of 60, which they should really bear; and notwithstanding that fraud, for it is nothing less, it is a partial protection?

If this bill becomes a law, and such protection to wool as now exists is lost, it can not be possible that fine and medium wool-raising will continue in this country. It will cease to exist, and the vast capital employed in that business will be mostly lost. Foreign wool will come in at prices so low as to drive the sheep to the slaughter-house at any price of mutton. But, says the free-trader, "the consumer of woolen goods will buy cheaper." Ah! there's the rub. Will he? When the wool syndicate of London, which controls all the wools of the world, save that produced in the United States, finds the markets of America in its hands, without competition, why should it sell at low prices? It will not, and wools and woolens will range higher than now, and the "science" of political economy will invent some new lie to cover the failure of its prophecy.

I have been at a loss to account for the determined assault upon the industry of wool-raising, made especially by the Democratic members of the House from the Southern States. It is understood that they insist upon putting wool on the free-list whatever else occurs. It is even said they are prepared to bargain everything else away, if necessary, for this. I noticed that a large amount of wool, of a coarse grade, was produced in the South, particularly in Texas, and had observed that Southern products had been kindly dealt with by this bill; notably rice and sugar—the first being protected by the bill as high as 100 per cent. and the latter at the rate of 68 per cent.—whereas in both cases the tariff is a tax upon all the rice and sugar consumed in the country, of which less than 10 per cent. is produced here, while the average per cent. fixed by the law is 47 per cent., and the rate on wool now existing less than 30 per cent.

Mr. Chairman, under these circumstances I say the anxiety exhibited by these gentlemen to get wool on the free-list was, so far as I could see, without good cause. There was no principle involved that was not involved in the matters of rice and sugar. If it is wrong to tax the laboring man to use the deceptive words of these gentlemen, 30 per cent. for his clothing, it would appear to be farther from the right to tax him from 68 to 100 per cent. for his food.

I have carefully watched the debate for light upon this subject, but saw none till early in May, when the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM], who so ably represents his district, a district having, I think, within its limits a greater number of sheep than any other district in the United States, took the floor and made a speech in favor of the "Mills bill." The gentleman's known honesty and candor gave me hope of being able to solve the riddle. Nor was I disappointed. In that speech, to be found in the RECORD of May 5, and on page of the RECORD 3945, the gentleman used the following words:

It is, I think, worthy of note that while the average value of sheep per head for the whole country is placed at $2.05, the lowest average, where sheep-raising is of special importance, is given to Texas and New Mexico. The fleeces of this quality of sheep, however, would, it is believed, be in greater demand for purposes of manufacturing admixture with the finer wools that would be imported, as a result of the removal of the present duties on wools.

Look at it! Texas sheep are of low average value because the wool is of coarse fiber, but, as Mr. LANHAM says, the fleeces of this quality of sheep would be in greater demand—that is, of higher value—to mix with finer wools that would be imported as a result of the removal of the present duties on wool.

The gentleman understands the meaning of this bill. He does not propose to mix his coarse wool with fine Northern wool, but with the "finer wools that would be imported as a result of the removal of the present duties on wools."

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM], as well as does the other distinguished gentleman from the same State [Mr. MILLS], knows that if this bill becomes a law it will be as impossible to raise wool for the market in Ohio, Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Indiana, and Michigan as it is to raise camels. The impending destruction, however, is viewed with great calmness, for Texas will be benefited by the ruin. Yet, sir, there are members of this House, from my State as well as from other States, who will vote for this damaging iniquity, although they were elected under personal pledges to support no such bill! The people alone can hold them to account for pledges as solemnly made as they are determinately broken.

Mr. Chairman, in some quarters this bill is claimed to be not a free-trade bill. So far as one great interest of my constituents is concerned it is in the full sense a free-trade measure, in fact as it concerns many interests of theirs, but the spirit of this great discussion has been one of free trade. No matter by what name it goes, it means free trade. It is understood to be a starting point, a step toward free trade. All the argument is to that end, from the President's message on. The argument in the press and on this floor has no basis if it be not that. The bill and the reasons given for its passage mean free trade in the ordinary and just sense of the term. No gentleman favoring the bill has said during all this discussion one word in favor even of incidental protection, an element heretofore thought to be found in a tariff for revenue only.

I regret that cunning or cowardice outside of Congress has to some extent sought to cloud the issue in some quarters.

The Oregon election was a day too early to promote honesty of expression.

I will make use of a sufficient number of extracts from this debate to prove that protection no longer has Democratic support. The opposite of protection is free trade. Mr. HEMPHILL in a very able speech on this floor, April 27, 1888, said:

Except in a humanitarian sense it can be a matter of no concern to the people of America as to how numerous the pauper laborers of Europe may be, nor how cheaply they work, nor what their condition is. As to these things we are and must be, in a financial and political sense, indifferent. It is only when the products of the labor of these workmen reach American workers and we are about to exchange the products of our labor for theirs that any real interest is awakened in these people, for it is then that the manufacturer begins to call upon the Government to protect him; it is then that he demands that he shall be surrounded by the law and safely guarded.

But against what? Not against the "pauper labor," for they are not here, and not against the products of their toil so long as these are not sold here; but the protection asked for is against allowing Americans to buy or exchange, i. e., against the natural right of any free man to make his purchases where his taste inclines him or his judgment or interest dictates. So that it is not against the pauper labor of Europe or of any other country, but it is against the right of the American people to buy where and what they please that this protection is demanded. That is, they ask protection, not against any wrong, but against a right of their own countrymen, and demand that one citizen's privileges shall be increased by having those of another curtailed.

It is clear, therefore, that it is not against the "pauper labor of Europe," except in a very indirect and remote way, that our protection laws are aimed, for so long as he keeps his handiwork at home or sells it on the other side of the Atlantic he excites no interest whatever on this side of the water.

It is only when an American citizen, following his inclination or interest, starts to exchange the fruits of his honest and laborious toil, whether it be cotton, corn, wheat, or tobacco, that the Government lays its hand upon him and says, "No; for it has been solemnly decreed that certain of the citizens of this country shall be guarded and protected against the natural right of the others to dispose of the products of their own labor according to their own judgment."

And in the same speech—

it is used for the legitimate purpose of revenue only.

But against the perversion of this power of taxation to the unholy and unhallowed scheme erroneously called "protection" I do complain, and shall endeavor to show its illegality and injustice, and, if I can, some of the hollow pretenses on which it is founded and has been so long maintained.

And during the same speech the following colloquy took place:

Mr. PERKINS. Then, I will ask the gentleman a question. Do you believe in the doctrine that we should be permitted to buy where we can buy cheapest?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. PERKINS. Then you believe in the doctrine that we should be permitted to hire where we can hire cheapest?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Who said so?

Mr. PERKINS. Does it not necessarily follow?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Well, I think so.

Mr. PERKINS. If we should be permitted to buy where we can buy cheapest, why should we not be permitted to hire where we can hire cheapest?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Exactly. I think that is right.

The gentleman from Mississippi, Colonel HOOKER, said (RECORD, page 4096):

I have said there is no gentleman on this side of the House who holds to the doctrine of protection for protection's sake under the taxing power of this Government. If there is such a one I have yet to hear him speak on this question.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TARSNEY] said (RECORD, page 3642):

They may impose taxes, they may collect taxes upon the people for the purposes specified in that article of the Constitution, but for no other purpose. And such as I understand it, has been the teaching, the practice, and the training of that grand political organization of which I have the honor to be an humble member.

But my Republican friends will say to me, "You may go beyond the mere power, the mere purpose expressed in the Constitution of the United States, and you may levy and assess taxes not alone for the support and maintenance of the Government, economically administered as we understand it, but you may go further and assess taxes for the purpose of protection."

Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the House for awhile to this view of the Constitution. I am frank to say to the gentlemen here who belong to the high-protection school of politics that I for one am prepared on the floor of this House to-day to say I do not believe in the doctrine of protection for protection's sake.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARUTH] said (see RECORD, page 3846):

This tariff is a most insidious enemy. It works in silence and under cover; and whilst it pretends to be giving us "protection" it is really stealing our substance and destroying our lives. It is not the highwayman who boldly gallops up on the public road and demands "your money or your life," but the sneak-thief who in an unconscious moment filches your purse or the burglar who robs you of your possessions in sleep's unconscious hour. It holds to the false doctrine of Othello.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM] said:

I will say to gentlemen on the other side of the House that if you are not willing to accept the present moderate bill, you will drive the people of this country to a much more extreme measure. In my judgment, if this very conservative measure is not accepted, the next House that comes here from the people will come instructed and ready to make a much more radical reduction than we now propose. The people are in earnest, and the longer the matter is delayed the more sweeping will be their demands.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MARTIN] is recorded on page 433, current RECORD:

In the battle to be waged this year there will come a charge from the great body of working people which will be made on the second Tuesday of next November, and so terrific will it be in its force that you protectionists will fall before it like grass before the scythe.

The day of the protectionist is fast drawing to a close. We are entering upon a new epoch in the history of our country.

The gentleman from North Carolina, Judge MCCLAMMY, said as follows (see RECORD, page 4662):

A protective tariff is an unjust and unfair discrimination by the Government in favor of one class of citizens against another class of citizens. It is an enforced contribution in which one man is made to contribute to the support of another man's business without a resulting benefit, and contrary to the spirit and letter of our Constitution. The Government has a right to tax people either directly or indirectly to raise money to carry on the Government, but Congress has no right under the Constitution to force A to support B in his business. What right has the Government to show such difference and such partiality as to pass a law to force one man, without value received, to give his money to the assistance of another man in his private business? And yet that is what those who advocate a protective tariff are doing, and that is what has been forced upon the working masses and poor toilers for lo! these many years, until injustice and wrong come up in sighs and groans from the oppressed poor in a greater grief and deeper woe than escaped from the hearts of the unhappy Jews when they toiled and endured Egyptian bondage.

I will close this class of quotations by a single sentence from the recent speech of the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. COX]:

It would be a glorious consummation of this debate could we only have gentlemen on the other side join in this invocation to paper and to type and to the hearts of honest men to clear the way for British Cobden free trade.

As further evidence of the nature and meaning of the controversy now here proceeding I will quote briefly from spectators, who, though interested in the result, are certainly capable of seeing the true meaning of the conflict.

Recently a prominent member of the British Parliament enthusiastically exclaimed:

To convert the United States is indeed a triumph. The Cobden Club will henceforth set up a special shrine for the worship of President Cleveland and send him all its publications gratis. Cobden founded free trade; Cleveland saved it.

[From the London Saturday Review.]

President Cleveland declines cautiously to dub himself a free-trader; but he caters up a free-trade position without disguise.

[From the London Pall Mall Gazette.]

English free-traders would be well advised if they moderated the ecstacy of their jubilation over President Cleveland's message. Every word which they say in its favor will be used as a powerful argument against the adoption of its recommendations.

[From the Chronicle, London.]

It is many years since such an important and suggestive message has been sent to Congress. If the policy of President Cleveland is adopted its effect on the trade of the world can not fail to be immense.

Another paper says:

The consensus of opinion is that should Congress adopt the suggestions so unequivocally made by Mr. Cleveland the first effect would be beneficial to a large number of English industries.

The London Saturday Review again says:

Nothing can be more explicit than the President's language. "The simple and plain duty which we owe the people is to reduce taxation to the necessary expenses of an economical operation of the Government and to restore to the business of the country the money which we hold in the Treasury." In America this means free trade.

The London Times says:

It is calculated that to give effect to Mr. Cleveland's policy duties to the amount of some £16,000,000 a year, about two-fifths of the entire customs revenue, must be surrendered. This operation may not establish free trade in the strict sense of the term, but it will to a great extent make trade free.

The London Post says:

We shall be much mistaken if the effect of this state communication will not be to strengthen considerably the case of free-traders in all parts of the world. It will be regarded as a step in the right direction by all who believe in the soundness of free-trade principles.

In two leading articles the London Colliery Guardian for December 16 says:

No event of greater magnitude has occurred in the iron, steel, and mining industries for a long time past than the proposal which is now made to effect a radical change in the fiscal policy of the United States. America has been of immense value as a market to the trade of this country. The effect which, on iron and steel making, the bare possibility even of the admittance of raw material free of duty, together with reductions in the duties of some descriptions of iron and steel, has produced upon our exchanges is a portent in itself. The Scotch warrant-holders took greater advantage of the occurrence than even the probabilities authorized. If President Cleveland should be able to carry out his plan for admission into America free of duty, one of the first effects which would be produced on the English iron trade would be the transference of much of the enormous stocks of pig in the Scotch and Cleveland markets to United States ports. Shipments of hematites from Scotland and from the west coast of England would also increase. The iron-ore mines of Lancashire and West Cumberland would be certain to do a greatly enlarged trade with the United States.

The future course of events will be watched with considerable interest by the British iron trade. It is, after all, circumstances which guide the destinies of nations, and it appears to us that the present circumstances favor the adoption by Congress of Mr. Cleveland's proposals for reducing import duties. If the duties now levied upon British rails entering American ports should be reduced to any appreciable extent, the reduction may exert a happy influence upon the British rail trade. Even as matters now stand, English rails have found some favor with American railroad companies during the last few months, and there can be little doubt that they will come into extended use in the United States if the adoption in whole or in part of Mr. Cleveland's views makes them more readily available for American consumption.

In an article on "The Coal Trade in 1887 and its Prospects for 1888," the London Times says:

If President Cleveland's tariff reforms are carried, English goods and iron and steel largely will go to the States in greatly increased proportions.

Free trade does not deny the right to tax imports, but in such taxation it eliminates protection. England has a revenue of more than one hundred millions from this source, all laid upon articles not produced in Great Britain, and so it is wholly unprotective.

The foundation principle of free trade the world over is that a tariff is a tax equal to the duty levied by it, and nothing more; that this tax is levied upon all articles included in the dutiable list, whether imported or home-produced, and increases the price of all regardless of the place of production. It is then argued that when applied to home-produced commodities it taxes the consumer for the benefit of the producer, and is thus partial and unjust. See the extract just read from Judge MCCLAMMY'S speech.

If the premise is sound the argument is just, and the result is inevitable, that imports can justly be placed only on foreign commodities.

To illustrate: Suppose the United States consumes $100,000,000 of tea yearly, a tax of 10 per cent. would raise a revenue of $10,000,000, as we import all our tea.

Suppose, again, that our people use $100,000,000 of sugar, and produce $10,000,000 of it, it is evident that a duty of 10 per cent. would turn only $9,000,000 into the Treasury, and $1,000,000 would go to the planter.

Still again, suppose we need $100,000,000 of iron and steel, of which we produce $90,000,000 and import $10,000,000, it is apparent that a 10 per cent. duty would bring but $1,000,000 revenue, and, according to this theory, distribute $9,000,000 among the producers; either the capitalist or laborer, or both.

It does not take a wise man to see what this argument means. Surely the principle is not changed by a change of the amount of the tariff charge. If it is wrong to steal $5, it is also wrong to steal four. Our friends must not drive us out of court on this argument and then take the position from which we have been driven. If a tariff of 47 per cent. is robbery, is not one of 40 per cent. at least larceny? The only possible standing place is to advocate a tariff, if any, on articles not produced in this country, such as tea, coffee, spices, etc., or to deny the soundness of the foundation principle of our trade.

But, Mr. Chairman, the entire history of our country demonstrates the utter falsity of the doctrine that a tariff is only a tax. Protection has caused a continuous decline in the prices of most of our staples, and at times when tariffs have lessened, prices have increased—always so when the reduction of the duty closed our factories.

The fact is undoubted, and the reason for it I have already given—to wit, home competition secured by the tariff.

The unexampled growth and development of the resources of the country for the last twenty-five years is a demonstration of the wisdom of the great American system of protection. Not the least of the advantages of that system is the retention of capital in the country. Nothwithstanding the unnecessary increase of the surplus there has occurred no stringency in the money market; in fact, during all the time that surplus has been accumulating the money in circulation has increased also, and at the rate of from forty to sixty millions a year.

Our exports are now about equal to our imports, but if the "Mills bill" had been a law during the last two years the balance of trade would have been largely against us, and would have been made good with gold and silver. Capital would then become lessened, circulation diminished, prices of farms, as well as of their products, depreciated, and our country would become poorer, in the way that an individual does whose expenses exceed his income.

The greatest advantage of protection, however, is to be seen in the condition of labor under its mantle. Wages are not only higher than in England, Ireland, Italy, Hungary, Poland, and other free-trade or semi-free-trade countries, but the condition of the laborer is infinitely more bearable and hopeful. He may live comfortably and respected, and he may educate his children and expect them to become worthy, useful, and leading citizens. They are eligible to all places under the Government, capable of any business enterprise, and may hold any social position. This state of things exists only where protection is general, and it is that only in the United States. Goods are cheap in Italy, in Hungary, and in Poland, but labor is cheaper, and the laborer can not buy. The laboring man emigrates from free-trade countries to protective ones, not from protective countries to free-trade ones.

By laborer I do not simply mean those engaged in masses in great centers of industry, but the farmer and farm laborer as well, the village and country mechanic, and the worker in any employment, alone or with others, everywhere.

It is time for all such to see to it that the system of protection which was commenced in the days of Washington and which has hitherto existed be not stricken down by open foes or pretended friends.

As an answer to the false cry that the Republicans are in favor of a continuation of "war tax" and are indisposed to reduce unnecessary revenue, I append a statement of the minority of the Ways and Means Committee, taken from their report on the "Mills bill:"

WHAT REDUCTIONS HAVE TAKEN PLACE.

It is a striking fact that all of the reductions of taxation which have occurred since the conclusion of the war, with the exception of the trifling ones made by the acts of March 1, 1879, and of May 20, 1880, aggregating a little over $5,000,000, were accomplished while the party now in the minority was in the majority and in control of legislation.

A brief summary of what has been done in this regard will be both suggestive and instructive.

By the act of July 14, 1870, the reduction of the revenue from customs duties was:

Free-list	$2,403,000
Estimated reduction from dutiable list	23,651,748
Total	26,054,748

By the act of May 1, 1872, tea and coffee were placed upon the free-list, making a reduction of $15,893,843

By the act of June, 1872, tariff duties were further reduced, and the reduction by the—

Free-list	$3,345,724
Estimated deduction from the dutiable list	11,933,191
Total	15,278,915

By the act of March 3, 1883, from tariff:

Free-list	$1,365,999
Estimated reduction from dutiable list	19,489,800
Total	20,855,799

The foregoing estimates were made when the several bills were passed.

Of internal taxes the following have been the reductions made by the party now in the minority since the conclusion of the war:

By the acts of July 13, 1866, and March 2, 1867	$103,381,199
By the acts of March 31, 1868, and February 3, 1869	54,802,578
By the act of July 14, 1870	55,315,321
By the act of December 21, 1871	14,436,862
By the act of June 6, 1872	15,807,618
By the act of March 3, 1883	40,677,682
Total	284,421,260

This we present as the result of Republican legislation from July 13, 1866, down to and including March 3, 1883.

The Republican party was in control of the House of Representatives from the first-named date to March 4, 1875. During that period it will be observed that taxation was reduced and revenue diminished in the aggregate sum of $284,421,260. On the 4th of March, 1875, the control of the House passed to the Democratic party and remained with it until the 4th day of March, 1881, a period of six years. During these years the internal revenue was reduced $6,368,965. On the 4th day of March, 1881, the Republican party was reinvested with control of the House of Representatives, holding it for two years, during which time it reduced taxation and the revenues from customs sources in the estimated sum, $20,855,799 and upon internal revenue $40,677,682, a grand total of $61,432,481.

Since the 4th day of March, 1883, the House of Representatives has been dominated by the present majority party, a period of five years, and no taxes have been reduced and no curtailment of the revenues has taken place, although warned of a threatened surplus not only by the present Administration but by the preceding one of President Arthur. It will be observed that from 1865 to 1888, a period of twenty-two years, the control of the House of Representatives has been equally divided between the two political parties, each having eleven years.

During the eleven years of Republican control the revenues were reduced (estimated)	$362,504,569
During the eleven years of Democratic control the revenues were reduced	6,368,935
Difference in favor of the present minority party in the House of	356,135,634

If it be claimed that for the most part during the Democratic control of the House the Senate was dominated by the Republican party, and therefore the responsibility of failure to reduce the revenues should be alike shared by them, we answer that under the Constitution of the United States the House alone can originate bills to reduce taxation, the Senate having no jurisdiction of the subject until it is given to it by a bill which passes the House, and that during all these years no such bill has gone from the House to the Senate, and therefore the sole responsibility for failure rests with the present majority in the House of Representatives.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to have a time fixed which will suit the convenience of gentlemen on both sides of the House when the vote shall be taken on the free-wool paragraph of this bill, and I ask unanimous consent that it be taken at 1 o'clock to-day.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The pending proposition is to put wool on the free-list. The President of the United States in his last annual message recommends this, and the majority of the Ways and Means Committee have followed this recommendation in formulating the bill. Why should wool be put on the free-list? The friends of this bill insist it shall be, and in fact seem to care more for this part of the bill than all the rest. Wool, as is well known, is a purely agricultural product. While to the manufacturer it is "raw material," to the farmer who raises the sheep, clips the wool, and sends it to market it is a finished product. If we take the capital, time, and labor requisite to produce a clip of wool into consideration, it will be found that it requires relatively as much capital and labor and far more time to produce a pound of wool than it does to produce a yard of cloth.

Are the farmers of this country growing rich too fast? Hardly. They know the depressed condition of their industry better than any member of this House can know it. I feel it to be my duty to oppose with all the power I possess any attempt to make that condition worse than it is now. It is said that if we make wool free, wools which we do not raise could be imported, and then our factories could be encouraged and a home market created for our home-grown wool. But the difficulty is in the fact that we do now raise the wools we need.

From the arid plains of New Mexico and Western Texas to the green and dewy hills of Vermont we have every variety of soil and climate, and the American farmer is able and ready if given proper encouragement to supply the whole home demand, both as regards quantity and quality. The condition of the wheat and corn market has become such that our farmers must diversify their products.

Wheat now bears a duty of 20 cents per bushel. India and Russia have become recently large producers of wheat, and from their competition in the London market wheat has fallen greatly in price. England, with her usual care for her own interests, has, at her own cost, constructed a vast mileage of railroads in India. The Indian farmer pays his ryots, or laborers, from 8 to 12 cents per day, and he can put his wheat in London at a profit of 70 cents per bushel. For the year ending June 30, 1887, the United States exported to all countries 101,971,949 bushels of wheat. For the year ending March 31, 1887, India exported 41,558,250 bushels of wheat.

The increase of this Indian competition and the competition from Russia must continue, as there remain in those countries yet rich tracts to be brought under cultivation. Our Eastern farmers, foreseeing this, have given attention to the production of other articles. But here, too, they find that the present protection is inadequate. I have here the "Summary statement of the imports and exports of the United States for the eleven months ending May 21, 1888." From this official document I compile the following statement of imports of farm products for that period:

Animals, free	$3,162,613
Animals, dutiable	4,401,145
Eggs	2,061,641
Farinaceous substances	852,286
Skins other than fur	21,489,912
Barley	8,959,087
Corn	19,928
Oats	21,802
Oatmeal	36,146
Rye	20
Wheat	314,979
Wheat flour	12,738
All other	113,623
Bristles	1,138,209
Flax	1,509,256
Hemp	6,165,657
Figs	495,740
Oranges	2,134,292
Plums and prunes	2,657,418
Hay	850,226
Hops	1,004,511
Barley malt	137,077
Prepared meats	300,632
All other meat products	148,409
Butter	24,549
Cheese	1,101,184
Milk, condensed	335,119
Flaxseed	1,386,535
Leaf-tobacco	10,218,665
Beans and pease	2,128,110
Potatoes	3,560,372
All other vegetables	1,013,077
Wool	14,540,663

By this bill nearly all the above have already been put on the free-list, and now it is proposed to do the same with wool. This line of policy is against the agriculturist of the East, and I must vote against it. January 1, 1888, there were but 105,276 sheep in New Jersey, of the value of $389,100. With proper attention this industry could be largely enlarged. It certainly should receive encouragement and not discouragement at the hands of the National Legislature. Deny it as you may, juggle with figures as you will, you can never convince the farmer of this country that putting wool on the free-list is not against his interest, and when he sees how you, in this bill, put nearly everything else he raises on the free-list he will be convinced, not only that you strike him, but that you mean to strike him.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I do not wish to take up the time of the committee, but I do desire to have put in the RECORD the tables which set forth the effect of the schedule proposed by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCKINLEY] and prepared by the convention of woolen manufacturers and so-called wool-growers.

I therefore ask to have printed Table No. 1, prepared by one of the most expert of the officers in the customs service, and Table No. 2, also prepared by an expert.

MEMORANDA.

It would be impracticable to administer the clause providing that "no wool shall be included in class 3 which shall be imported for any purpose other than for the manufacture of carpets or low grade of blankets," etc. The customs officers can not know the purpose for which any wool is imported. If imported for making blankets, how is the dividing line between low-grade and high-grade blankets to be determined? In all fleece wool designated as of class 3, there are portions fit for use other than the "manufacture of carpets or low grades of blankets." Must the customs officers assort all such wool and assess duty on each quality separately according to the uses to which it is adopted or for which they may think it is intended to be applied?

In the foregoing estimate it is assumed that carpet wool (class 3) upon which duty was assessed in 1887 at 5 cents to 15 cents per pound (costing upon an average over 18 cents per pound) would fall within the class "imported for purposes other than the manufacture of carpets or low grades of blankets," and would therefore pay the same duty as wools of classes 1 and 2.

Under the present law woolen rags, shoddy, mungo, waste, and flocks are subject to a uniform rate of duty of 10 cents per pound, and not being returned separately there is no data showing the importations of each of said articles, which are provided for in the proposed schedule at different rates. The amounts of each, as stated in the above table, are mere estimates, but are believed to be fair, as it is well known that the bulk of such information consist of ring waste, garneted waste, and purified shoddy.

The statement of "goat-skins, raw" represents the value of the importation of goat-skins only imported free during the fiscal year 1887. In estimating the quantity of camel llama, and other hair made dutiable under the proposed schedule, it is assumed that at least one-third of "cattle and other" hair imported during the last fiscal year free of duty, would fall within the provision.

Mr. MILLS. Then at 1 o'clock the vote is to be taken.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the pending question is on striking out the whole section; but that proposition is divisible.

Mr. DINGLEY. Is not the present question upon striking out that part relating to wool simply?

The CHAIRMAN. The pending motion is to strike out the whole section, but on that any gentleman can demand a division and have a vote upon striking out any separate clause.

Mr. ADAMS. I understood that the proposed limitation applied only to the time when the vote on the free-wool clause should be taken.

Mr. MILLS. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. That is all.

Mr. ADAMS. My understanding is that unanimous consent was asked and given that a vote should be taken on the first lines of the paragraph.

Mr. MILLS. The understanding is that at 1 o'clock we will take a vote on the amendment offered on the other side of the House to strike out the free-wool clause.

Mr. ADAMS. I wish to say one word relating to the time of the year at which the free-wool clause and the clause providing for a lower duty on woolens shall take effect; and as I understand it it is a practical business proposition. I hold in my hand a letter transmitted to me by importers of woolen goods in the city where I reside, and I will ask the attention of all those who are willing to consider the question from a practical point of view.

This is not a question involving the subject of protection or anti-protection. Mr. Chairman, I saw some time ago an interview reported to have been had with Henry Watterson immediately after the St. Louis convention, in which he declared that the Democratic party would be very conservative in the way in which they brought the change in our fiscal policy to bear upon the industries of the country, and he is said to have used these words: "We will give notice to the tenants before we take the roof off the house."

That, Mr. Chairman, was the precise purpose with which I proposed at the beginning of the five-minute debate to change the time of the year at which the free-list clause should take effect. My argument was that it should take effect at the beginning or end of a manufacturing season. If I had at that time carefully studied this bill as far as the end of section 2 I should have found that the committee had adopted that identical principle with reference to flax, hemp, and jute and the manufactures thereof. We had before us a free-list, including these articles; that is, hemp, jute, flax, and many others; and it was provided that that should take effect on the 1st day of July. I insisted that in justice and fairness it should take effect at a different period of the year. At the very time when we were discussing that question there was a provision in this bill, as yet invisible, because it was at the end of a section which we had not reached, which applied that very principle to two of the articles which we were then discussing.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to have applied to the change in the laws regarding wool and woolens that same principle of practical justice and fair play which the committee has seen fit to adopt with reference to jute and flax and hemp, and all substitutes for hemp. I send to the desk to be read a letter on this subject from a firm in Chicago, who are largely engaged in dealing in men's furnishing goods. They are not raisers of wool; they are not manufacturers of woolen goods, but they know the course of trade; they know the customs prevailing among business men in this country, and they believe that this bill should be modified in accordance with those existing customs. I now ask to have the letter read.

CHICAGO, April 28, 1888.

DEAR SIR: In view of the possibility of the Mills tariff bill becoming a law there is one provision therein that has probably been inserted by Mr. MILLS without knowing how injurious such a law would be to all interested. We presume that he has no intention of seriously injuring any portion of the citizens of this country, yet he has made a very grave error in fixing the date of the entry of raw free wool as July 1, 1888, and also of reducing so seriously the import duties on woolen manufactured goods on the day of October 1, 1888.

All woolen manufacturers must make their contracts early in the beginning of the year for the following fall and winter business, and by the 1st of July to have manufactured at least three-quarters of their production for the season.

The importer is necessarily obliged to place his orders early in the year for the ensuing fall and winter business. Every importer has already so placed his orders, the samples are now out in the hands of traveling men, prices have been fixed, and goods are now being sold at such prices and must be delivered in August and September. Fully three-quarters of the entire fall and winter business of the importer and wholesaler is done before the middle of September.

These being facts, it clearly proves the great injustice that would result to manufacturers, importers, and wholesale dealers if the Mills bill, as it is framed, should become a law. It would prove seriously disastrous to the manufacturer as well as to the wholesale dealer. If it did not prove disastrous to these several parties there would be no benefit accrue to the consumer, and we presume that this is what Mr. MILLS has in mind in framing this bill.

If the bill is to pass can not Mr. MILLS be prevailed upon to so change it that the time for the reduction on free wool can be changed to take effect January 1, 1889, and the time for reduction on woolen manufactured goods take effect from July 1, 1889? With these changes no injuries would result to wholesale dealers and manufacturers, and the consumer will get every possible benefit from the reduced prices.

Very respectfully,

WILSON BROS.

Hon. GEORGE E. ADAMS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ADAMS. I would like to have one minute more to state in one sentence the effect of the proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the gentleman will proceed for one minute longer.

Mr. ADAMS. Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to call the special attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RUSSELL] to the purport of this letter, because I infer that he knows something of the wool business. It states what I believe to be true, that from January to July wool is finding its way into the woolen mills; and that the woolen cloth is finding its way from the woolen mills through the jobber and the wholesaler to the retailer during the latter part of the year. By October the woolen cloth may have reached the wholesaler; therefore the retailer will diminish his purchases if he understands there is to be a radical change in the law about that period in the year. Therefore, on the same principle of justice which the committee has applied to flax and jute, the change ought to take place in January rather than in October or July. The change in the duty on wool should take effect in January, at the beginning of the season in which the manufacturers are buying wool. The change in the duty on woolens should take effect six months later, that is, on July 1, 1889. That is the proposition of my constituents. It seems to me a reasonable one. At all events, the committee should have the same consideration for those who have made business engagements in wool and woolens as they take pains to show for those who are interested in hemp.

Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts. A statement having appeared in the newspapers, and also having been made on the floor of this House, that many wool manufacturers, especially in New England and the Middle States, are in favor of free foreign wool, I desire to submit the authoritative statement of Mr. William Whitman, president of the National Wool Manufacturers' Association, bearing upon this very point. I send to the desk to be read for the information of the House a letter received from that gentleman this morning.

WASHINGTON, July 16, 1888.

DEAR SIR: The woolen manufacturers of the United States, especially those of the New England and Middle States, are opposed to the removal of the duty upon foreign wool.

They believe that the permanent success of the wool-manufacturing industry of the United States is dependent upon the growth in this country of their principal raw material, wool—a raw material which shall be indigenous to our soil and climate.

They also believe that the comfort, prosperity, and independence of our people are as dependent upon the growth of sheep in our country for food and for clothing, as they are upon the products of the soil for food, and of the mines for fuel and for use in the mechanic arts.

The number of New England manufacturers who favor free wool can be numbered by the fingers of my hands, and I believe by the fingers of one hand. On this I am in a position to speak with authority.

Yours, very truly,

WM. WHITMAN,
President National Association of Wool Manufacturers.

Hon. C. H. ALLEN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Chairman, in May last in the course of the general debate on the bill now under consideration I was so generously treated in the allowance of time that I will now ask of the committee but a very brief hearing. I do not wish to repeat arguments I then made against the propriety of putting wool on the free-list, and will therefore confine myself, so far as I can, to replying to some things that have occurred in the course of the debate since that time. Nothing that I have yet heard has in the least changed my mind, and I believe as I did then, that it is bad policy to put wool on the free-list. To my mind the arguments are clear, plain, and unanswerable that the sheep-raiser and wool-grower is entitled to have his industry protected against foreign competition, and that this protection in its effects is a benefit to all the people of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, there is one feature of this discussion which, if I may be allowed to use the expression, is noticeable by its absence. No gentleman advocating the passage of the Mills bill has as yet, so far as I recollect, given as a reason for placing wool on the free-list that its effect will tend to the well-being of the whole country and the benefit of the entire people of the United States. No one has advocated it as a great national policy which is to make us stronger as a people, better prepared to meet our adversaries in war, or that will diversify our industries and enable our citizens to live better in time of peace. I am surprised, Mr. Chairman, that this new policy, this new departure from the system of protection, has not elicited from gentlemen on the other side arguments, or at least attempted arguments, in that direction.

But none have been given us. No gentleman has explained to us how the more than 1,000,000 of persons employed in this industry can be better employed after we have given Australia and South America free permission to supply our home markets with their wool. No one has told us what good, cheap, and wholesome meat our people can obtain to take the place of lamb and mutton when this bill shall have made the raising of sheep unprofitable.

Neither have we heard how the lands now covered with flocks can be adapted to a better use. No one has told us what we have or can produce that foreign countries will take from us in exchange for the wool we are expected to buy from them.

There is but one inference. We must year after year send gold and silver abroad to buy the wool we are now raising, send it where but little if any of it will ever return to us. How we could get a supply, even with coin, in case of war, can not be told, for all of the great powers of Europe are stronger on the ocean than we are, and the advocates of the Mills bill are opposed to our building a navy or even establishing mail lines of steam-ships.

All the arguments in favor of free wool can be reduced to this: that it will, for the time being, enable poor people to get cheaper clothing.

It is alleged, not even proven, that next year blankets will be cheaper, that a wool hat can be bought for less in Kentucky, that Arkansas constituents will thereby be enabled to purchase woolen clothes, and that the inhabitants of the cotton-growing States will be relieved of the terrible high prices they have been paying for what they wear.

These are the arguments that have been repeated to us over and over again by gentlemen who represent the old slave States, and who are the real fathers of this bill. Occasionally we have had a Democrat from the North, who, driven and scourged by the party lash, comes reluctantly to the support of the bill, and excuses himself to his constituents by alleging that it has been discovered that the same law that will make wool and woolens cheap to everybody else will enable the wool-grower to sell his wool dear and high.

Mr. Chairman, I observe a great change has come over the gentlemen who favor this bill in one respect. They no longer denounce protection as the sum of all villainies and a system of robbery, but, in fact, occasionally assert that they are not even free-traders themselves. I will not stop now to illustrate how the Oregon election and the very general denunciation that this bill is receiving throughout the country may be the cause of this. But gentlemen on the other side will allow me to say that this change comes too late.

By the message of your President, by the Mills bill itself, and by the resolutions of your national convention you have placed yourselves in direct and positive opposition to the entire system of protection. That is free trade as plain as language can make it. By your speeches two months since you left no doubt as to your true policy, and the American people care but little about the name you say you wish to be called.

So far as the wool schedule is concerned I suppose none of you are ready to deny that you are free-traders. No one will expect me in the discussion of this question to stop and inquire whether the new policy of this Administration under the Democratic party means ultimate free trade or not.

To the wool-grower and the men interested in that business the Mills bill is in express terms and without any qualifications absolute free trade. It is not a step in the right direction, as free-traders would describe some parts of the bill. No half-way measures about it. It is not an effort to lessen or lower the tariff under a pretext of reducing the income, but at once our ports and markets are made free to foreign wool of all kinds. The stranger pays nothing to stand on an equality with our citizens. It is free trade in wool. Perhaps, in this connection—lest some might infer that there was not much free trade in this bill beside wool—it may not be out of place to call attention to the fact that it is absolute free trade in many other industries of this country that give employment to thousands of our people. It proposes free trade in wool, free trade in wood, lumber, and timber of all kinds; free trade in salt; free trade in copper ores; free trade in hemp, manilla, and all vegetable fibers; free trade in tin-plate; free trade in fish; free trade in iron and steel cotton ties or hoops; free trade in vegetables; free trade in over one hundred other articles, with sweeping reductions in regard to many articles that are left dutiable.

During the general debate my colleague [Mr. BUCKALEW] gave as a reason for supporting the bill that he wanted free wool to benefit the manufacturers. Outside of the New England States Pennsylvania, and especially the city of Philadelphia, is more largely interested in the manufacture of woolen goods than any other part of the country. I was therefore much surprised that my colleague should give such a reason when he knew, or at least ought to know, the fact that the wool manufacturers of Philadelphia did not only not ask for free wool, but were uncompromisingly opposed to it.

A gentleman with as much experience and with as much general information as my colleague possesses should not have made such a mistake. I proposed at the time to ask him a question that would have called his attention to the matter, but he declined to yield. Mr. Chairman, I will call the attention of the committee to the evidence on this point. The wool manufacturers, wool-dealers, and wool-growers of the United States during the time this Congress has been in session, by representatives, met in this city and passed the strongest kind of resolutions, protesting against putting wool on the free-list. The associations of wool-growers of Pennsylvania, acting in harmony with the woolen manufacturers of our State, were represented in that meeting and united in this protest.

The woolen manufacturers of the city of Philadelphia have quite recently taken action on this matter, and to show that they have not changed their position on this subject I submit this extract of their proceedings:

[Extracts from the remarks of Mr. Theodore Justice, at a business men's meeting, Board of Trade room, Philadelphia, June 18, 1888.]

Mr. Chairman, as the President in his message to Congress singled out the wool industry for his attack, and as the majority of the Ways and Means Committee carry out his advice with the Mills bill, described by a Republican Congressman as a "viciously sectional scheme, full of malicious purpose toward the Northern States," it is proper that the wool men should be heard in regard to it. The President has thrown down the free-trade gauntlet, and, as a Republican business man, I say we willingly take it up and as freely accept the issue.

The wool men, embracing manufacturers as well as dealers and growers, are practically a unit against free wool, Democratic wool-growers being as outspoken as their Republican neighbors. The wool merchant, through their correspondents in every State and Territory, yes, in almost every county in the United States, hear but one voice, and they can speak advisedly of the opinions and intentions of wool men, Democrats as well as Republicans. * * *

Texas gave 80,000 majority for Cleveland, when his party said that the platform of 1884 did not mean free trade and meant no harm to any American industry. I ask you to take note of the next Texas majority for Mr. Cleveland. You can form some idea of it by the recent vote of the Democratic wool-growers in Oregon. The eastern part of that State was settled by Missourians and Kentuckians, whose sympathies and votes have always been with the South. These very men pooh-pooh'd the President's messages; they declared that it was only politics, and contained no menace to the wool industry. When the Mills bill was reported to the House they saw evidence that the President really meant what he said about free wool. Still they thought it could not be possible for an American Congress to cripple an important industry, and were not alarmed.

They were not convinced until the Oregon Democratic convention of Cleveland's office-holders, his civil service reform office-holders, indorsed the message, the Mills bill, and especially free wool. What was the result? The Republican managers in Oregon on figuring on the returns conceded to the Democrats the eastern or wool-growing portion of the State by their usual 1,500 majority; they never dreamed of any change of sentiment in that region. After making this allowance, they were rejoicing in a good 4,000 Republican majority, and were utterly surprised when the returns from the wool-growing counties of Eastern Oregon came in, to find that that heretofore Democratic section had given 1,500 Republican majority. The President's attack on wool had done it.

Mr. Chairman, protection is the very keystone of the arch of the wool business, both in wool growing and woolen manufacturing. The question of protection is bound up with the very life of the business. Wool growing in many sections of the United States has been fostered by and grown up under protection. I give a brief comparison of the cost of growing foreign and American wool:

The main cost of raising wool in foreign countries, where the sheep graze over the public domain, is the wages of the herder. In the Argentine Republic this quality of labor receives three Spanish dollars per month. In Montana, where the sheep also graze on the public domain, the wages of the herder, which is also the main cost of growing wool there, is $40 per month, as against $3 in South America.

This is an increase in the cost of growing American wool, otherwise under similar conditions, of 1,200 per cent. The freight on wool from Buenos Ayres to New York by sailing vessel is only one-quarter of a cent per pound, while the cheapest freight from Montana is 2 cents per pound to the same market. Here is an increase to the Montana grower in the cost of transportation of 700 per cent. over the cost to the South American grower. With this difference against the American grower on the free range, how much more must be the cost of raising wool on farms worth $50 to $75 per acre.

There are many erroneous opinions, Mr. Chairman, held by the press of Philadelphia as to the attitude of wool men toward free wool. I am sorry to say that at least three Philadelphia daily papers have had editorials on the subject which are wholly wrong. They could easily have obtained the truth from the Manufacturers' Club, or the Wool Merchants' Association, both of which (practically containing all who are in the business) are wonderfully united in opposition to free wool. Wool growers, wool dealers, and woolen manufacturers are almost unanimously opposed to free wool. They have so declared themselves in no uncertain words, through their associations and individually. This is the fact not here only, but throughout the whole country. It is the case in Massachusetts, where the woolen product of that State alone exceeds the entire amount of our importations of woolens.

Manufacturers throughout the United States, with the exception of scarcely more than 1½ per cent. of all of them, in spite of the seductive offer of the Mills bill of free raw material, say that they are for protection for wool growing from principle, and concede to the wool growers for their industry the protection which they demand for their own industry. They also believe that free wool is only the entering wedge for free goods later on.

In July, 1885, Hon. Daniel Manning, then Secretary of the Treasury, sent to the National Association of Wool Manufacturers a circular letter asking for information on the question of a possible revision of the tariff.

In reply the association, under date of October, 1885, among other things, said:

It will be observed that in this communication, which, we need not say, is addressed not only to you, but through you to Congress and the public, we have not urged, as has been customary with this association in former times, any argument for encouragement in behalf of the important industry most closely allied with our own, that of wool production. Circumstances, which we need not mention, seem to have made it expedient that each branch of the national wool industry should act independently in representing its interests as connected with tariff legislation.

As the domestic wool-grower, in view of the high cost of labor and the high scale of living required by American civilization, can not profitably send his wools abroad, and as every pound of foreign cloth imported, displacing a pound of American cloth which might be made here, at the same time displaces a quadruple weight of domestic wool, it might be claimed that the interests of our nearest allies are sufficiently served by securing defenses for the manufactures which constitute their only market. This was the narrow and selfish argument for exclusive protection to manufactures in former times.

A broader and more just policy now regards protection to any distinct interest but as a part of a universal system; and while we demand for our own finished products, and more imperatively still, for the labor by which they are wrought, the whole power of defense granted by the Constitution against other nations—defense against their policy, their pernicious trade, their extorted and pauper labor, no less than against their arms—we would extend the same defense to every home product, of the farm, the mine, and the forest, thus making our own identical with the national prosperity.

Mr. Chairman, a few days since the statement was made on this floor that the pendency of this bill and the menace of free wool had caused the loss of 10 cents per pound to the wool-grower on his clip for the present year; that its effect had been to lower the price of wool that much in the market.

An advocate of the Mills bill at once suggested that if the wool-grower lost 10 cents per pound on his wool the laborer of the country had gained that much in the reduced price at which he could buy his clothes.

But this is a fallacy easily answered. As yet the difference in price is so evenly distributed among the buyers, manufacturers, and merchants that it is scarcely appreciable by the man who buys clothes for himself and family. But the general depression in business, growing out of this state of affairs, has affected the wages and employment of our people, so that they have less to buy clothes with than they would have had if wool was bringing a good price.

I should add to the able and complete answer given to this question this morning by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR], that one class of our people can not gain by any injury or loss sustained by another class of people in the United States. We are bound together by a community of interest, and so we should be.

The prosperity of the individual citizen rises and falls with the general welfare of the country; you can not point out to-day any class of individuals who will eventually be better off because thousands and tens of thousands of our citizens who produce the present wool crop have suffered loss because of the apprehension brought about by the introduction of the Mills bill. It is true the wool-growers have suffered a severe loss, but they are really in no worse condition than those of many other industries. Nearly everything affected by this bill has been more or less harmed.

Many kinds of business throughout the country have directly suffered from precisely the same cause. Works are stopping, wages are being lowered, and but few new enterprises are being prosecuted. You hear "the rumble and grumble of disaster" in the distance, threatening every class of producers throughout the country.

But little attention, Mr. Chairman, has been given in this debate to the fact that a large part of the people of the United States are producers and not consumers. Those who favor this bill argue as if we were a nation of consumers who wanted everything cheap.

I can understand very well how a professor in a college at an annual fixed salary can argue in favor of free trade and low prices. It is easy to see how those who have regular fixed incomes from any source would be, for the time being, gainers by the passage of the bill. This is one of the reasons why English aristocracy with fixed ground-rents payable in money want free trade and low prices. But people with fixed incomes who do not labor are but a very small minority of the people of the United States. The large body of the consumers of our country, the bulk of our population, are also producers. We are an industrious, thrifty people, nearly all producers. The laws of our country must be made to do justice to the producers, and nothing short of protection is adapted to a nation like ours.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JACKSON. I ask unanimous consent to be permitted to proceed for a few minutes longer.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I do not object if gentlemen on that side are satisfied; but the understanding is that a vote is to be taken at 1 o'clock, and I shall object to any extension of the time beyond that. It is also understood that the time was to be equally divided, if desired.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will endeavor to divide the time as equally as possible.

Mr. BREWER. I think it was understood that one-half of the time was to be allotted to each side if desired.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Chairman, in the brief time allotted to me I desire to confine myself to the wool question, for the purpose of making a reply to one or two suggestions which have been made during the course of this debate. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY], inadvertently I presume, made a statement in his speech to the effect that we can not raise fine wool in this country which is necessary for our manufacturers, and that therefore we must have free wool in order to bring from abroad the fine wool necessary to supplement our coarser clip, so that our manufacturers may have both kinds in their business.

This is an entire mistake, and, as I have said, was no doubt inadvertently made by the gentleman from Missouri. His arguments, like most of those we hear in favor of this bill, are made to order. He starts out to make a speech in favor of free wool, and not having an opportunity to know much about the business falls into this error, and at once applies it as an argument in favor of the Mills bill. We do raise and can raise the very finest grades of wool; in fact, in that line our people excel. We do not want fine wool for any purpose, and least of all we want it free. The present tariff discriminates in favor of admitting some coarse goods at low duty on the ground we do not raise them here. Great frauds have been practiced by admitting fine wools under the pretense that they were coarse.

The question is really not whether we can raise the finer wools, but it has been raised as to whether we can raise profitably the coarser grades of wool, such as we call in late years in this country "carpet-wools." Fortunately the answer comes from the sheep-breeders and wool-growers throughout the country that there is no difficulty in raising that grade of wool if we are permitted to have adequate protection.

Another thing. Gentlemen seem to talk of the wool industry as if we could experiment with it; as if it was a matter with which we could exercise our discretion in the way of having free wool for a year or two, and if it was not found by experience desirable that we could revert to the old system of protection and resume the industry again the next year or the following year. No greater mistake was ever made. There is no industry in this whole country, even of the finest classes of manufacturing, that has required such long time and care in the development as the breeding of sheep and the bringing of the wool industry to its present condition. Wool is not a raw material. You never heard of the finer grades of sheep, the Southdown, the Merino sheep, and Black Top existing in a natural state. They are the result of many years of high breeding.

You have the Hottentot sheep and the coarse sheep of Mexico and of South America almost in a state of nature; but in order to produce fine grades of wool and a large, profitable fleece, careful breeding of sheep has been necessary. This condition has been brought about, as I have said, by many years of experiment and care, and I tell you, gentlemen, if you drive to the slaughter-pen the sheep of Pennsylvania, Ohio, Michigan, Vermont, and the Southwest, and destroy the finer grades, you can not in a generation return again to the position which you have lost.

Once more. I have tried, in looking over the arguments here, to find why it was that the gentlemen who started on this free-trade crusade should have selected the woolen industry as their objective point of attack, and think I am prepared to answer. It is this: Wool is an industry so uniformly distributed throughout the country that the gentlemen no doubt adopted the opinion that it was not extensive enough in any one particular locality to materially affect political questions. They evidently supposed that the people interested in it, being scattered over the whole country, would not be able to raise a very determined protest.

I do not think any man can give a good reason why free trade should be adopted in wool in preference to any other of the leading industries of the country. There is no argument that can be made to favor putting wool on the free-list that will not apply with equal force to sugar, rice, iron nails, glass, and many other things which are left protected by this bill.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM] says this bill is a mild attack on the system of protection. It is the first attack, and it was supposed, no doubt, to be safest to make it upon wool for the reason I have stated. If this succeeds you will take some other industry next; or, grown bolder, may take several. But, gentlemen, let me give you a little warning. There is no industry outside of manufactories in any section of this country that has better organization than the sheep-breeders and the wool-growers; and I say to gentlemen on the other side, with some considerable knowledge upon the subject, that there is a large number of your party associates as well as Republicans who are deeply interested in this matter.

Sheep-raisers are an intelligent class of people, not generally largely interested in politics, as the phrase goes, but they are interested in their business affairs. I do know that there are many of the officers of the associations of which I speak that are Democrats; and if you gentlemen will take the resolutions passed by these associations and protests sent here to Congress by men engaged in this industry you will discover that it is one upon which they are taking a great deal of interest. You will allow me to add that you will be very apt to hear from these men in a way you can not misunderstand in the coming elections.

No, gentlemen, you can not resume this industry if it is once abandoned, except after long years, and there are more people interested in it than you perhaps in your philosophy have dreamed of. There are more interested than are engaged in merely raising sheep and clipping the wool. There are men interested in taking care of the flocks, in furnishing supplies of mutton for the markets and for the shambles, and in various other ways connected with this immense industry. Those who desire to see a good supply of wholesome meat to feed the people in this country are interested in the sheep industry just as well as those who are engaged in the production of wool. I shall incorporate in my remarks at this time some communications I have received which bear directly upon this subject, and I ask respectful attention to them. They represent truly the sentiment of the parties most interested in this question.

You gentlemen have made this a party question, and as such you will be held responsible. In the vote that will shortly be taken on this section you will find no vote in favor of it except Democrats; not a single Republican in this Congress. A few Democrats will oppose it; but only a few. Your party must take the responsibility of this measure, and with it the rebuke that the people will most certainly give it. The fact that many of you from Northern States who will vote for free wool are at heart opposed to it will not relieve your party.

WASHINGTON, PA., July 11, 1888.

DEAR SIR: What shall become of the wool-grower? Our industry is paralyzed. The wool-grower has not prospered under the present tariff of 1883. The proof of this is manifest in the reduction of the number of our sheep of near 7,000,000 in the States and Territories. The continuous tariff tinkering that followed the passage of the act of 1883 had much to do in driving men out of the business and causing all to reduce their flocks; some gradually, others rapidly down to no sheep at all.

I am free to say from an extensive acquaintance with the wool-growers of not only our own State of Pennsylvania, but of all the States and Territories, that the passage of the Mills bill putting wool on the free-list will not meet with the approval of the wool-growers of the State of Pennsylvania, nor in any other State. The bill now before Congress, if passed, will be death, death, death, to the industry. The effect of this bill now before the House has destroyed our home market. Washington County, so long the banner wool county, yielding annually over 3,000,000 pounds of wool at living prices, now no longer prosperous, but shares the common fate of disaster with all other wool-growers in the States.

The actual cost of growing a pound of wool is 39 cents in Pennsylvania. Our market at present is 25 cents a pound for the highest, and much of our wool is bought at 18, 20, and 22 cents a pound. How can we live at such prices? It is simply impossible. Since the repeal of the act of 1867 and constant tariff tinkering to reduce the wool schedule the sheep of our own State have been reduced over 700,000. And why? Answer, the want of adequate protection.

I earnestly hope the Mills bill will not pass.

Yours, most truly,

JOHN McDOWELL.

President Pennsylvania State Wool-Growers' Association.

Hon. OSCAR L. JACKSON,
House of Representatives United States, Washington, D. C.

[Resolutions of Pennsylvania wool-growers, Twenty-fourth Pennsylvania district, passed in December, 1886.]

Resolved, That as wool-growers of Pennsylvania we pledge a determined resistance to the proposition to place wool on the free-list as a raw material.

Resolved, That in no just sense can a fleece of American-grown wool, requiring labor, capital, and skill for its high development as to quality and weight, be regarded a raw material.

Resolved, That the placing of carpet wools on the free-list, as suggested in some quarters apparently friendly to protection, which wools, with adequate protection, can be produced in America in sufficient quantities to meet our demands, would in practice result injuriously to wool-growing, opening new avenues to fraudulent valuation, and precluding the possibility of ever reaching the desirable point where we can produce all our needed wools.

Resolved, That a great national industry like that of wool-growing, so important as to be justly named the key to the protective system, should command such tariff duties as will fully protect it against the present large importations.

Resolved, That we favor the reduction of revenue by the increase of tariff duties, and the consequent decrease of importations which yield revenue.

Resolved, That we adhere without hesitation to our formerly expressed belief that wool-growing needs, and is fully entitled to, the protection afforded in the era in which that industry made its greatest progress in this country; and that, in a spirit of absolute fairness to the great twin industry of wool-manufacturing, we cheerfully accord to the manufacturing interest such a readjustment of duties, in the event of a tariff on wool being increased, as will be equitable and right.

Resolved, That we recognize as one of the greatest evils with which wool-growing has to contend, the constant menace with which both the measure of wool duties and their actual existence has been threatened in the last few years; and that we demand, above all things, a cessation of the Congressional agitation tending to the lowering or complete destruction of existing duties. If it is impracticable to secure at present the legislation we confidently claim as a right, the industry should at least have a period free from menace, in which to quietly recuperate.

LOUISVILLE, KY., June, 1888.

To the honorable members of the House of Representatives of the United States at Washington, D. C.:

We, the undersigned, woolen manufacturers, wool dealers, and others interested in the woolen business, do hereby petition your honorable body against the passage of what is known as the "Mills bill," believing that such an act will be greatly detrimental to and jeopardize the wool industry in this country, State, and city.

Henry W. Barret & Co., proprietors Eclipse Woolen Mills; L. Richardson, president Old Kentucky Woolen Mills Company; R. L. Whitney, secretary and treasurer Falls City Jeans and Woolen Company; Louisville and Madison Woolen Mills, J. W. Stine, president; Louisville (Ky.) Woolen Mills, George A. Robinson, secretary and treasurer; W. A. Hedden & Co., proprietors New Albany Hosiery Mills; New Albany Woolen Mill, J. F. Gebhart, superintendent; W. F. Robinson, vice-president Beargrass Woolen Mills; J. B. Halloway, secretary Beargrass Woolen Mills; W. E. Koop, treasurer Beargrass Woolen Mills; James Morning, superintendent Henderson Woolen Mill Company; Knoxville Woolen Mills, R. P. Gettys, secretary and treasurer; Richardson & Co., wool merchants; D. Davis, wool merchant; Samuel Dinkelspiels Sons, wool merchants; M. Sabel & Sons, wool merchants; Isaac Rosenbaum, wool dealer; L. Marx & Bro., wool dealers; E. A. Burford & Co.; D. A. Loud & Bro., Lexington, Ky., woolen manufacturers; L. Heacox & Sons, Jas. McCormick & Co., wool merchants; C. S. Brent, wool merchants; Sol. Cain, wool dealer; Laws Schneck, manager Seymour Woolen Mills, Albert N. Meyer, secretary and treasurer.

Mr. KERR. Mr. Chairman, when the tariff act of 1883 was passed the people of the whole country were interested in the wool schedule, and the Legislature of my own State of Iowa, in 1884, passed a resolution in favor of restoring the wool schedule of 1867. As a member of that Legislature I was the only person on the Republican side of the house who voted against that restoration. I did so for the reason that I believed the Tariff Commission having considered the matter it should remain as they recommended, in order that it might be given a fair test.

One of the reasons for the reduction of the wool tariff at that time was in order that the surplus revenue might be reduced. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TAYLOR] has shown us that as to five or six articles upon the wool schedule the revenues of the Government have been increased $11,000,000 by the reduction of the tariff of 1883, the importations having largely increased, and I think that fact ought to have some weight with the Democratic side of the House and with the country. They have reduced such a large number of articles on the pretense that the surplus revenue is too great; that there is too much surplus, too much money in the Treasury.

If the experience of the Government with reference to the wool schedule is worth anything, it establishes to a certainty the proposition that every reduction will, instead of reducing the surplus, have a tendency to increase it. Certainly the history of the Government since 1883 in regard to the wool schedule is an absolute proof of this proposition. So the Democratic party have wisely come to the conclusion with reference to the wool schedule that they can not again reduce the tariff with any hope of reducing the revenue, and consequently they have placed wool upon the free-list. That will serve to apprise the country of what will be the effect of the other reductions upon other schedules.

In regard to some other matters that have been brought up in this debate. Our worthy Chairman [Mr. DOCKERY] spoke the other day of the interest of the Democratic party in the laboring men of this country and made this extravagant proposition: The mother may forget her babe, but the Democratic party in this country will never forget the interests of the laboring man. I desire to know, Mr. Chairman, if the history of the Democratic party in this country warrants any such statement on the part of the Chairman of the committee? I tell you that throughout the whole history of the Democratic party in this country the interests of the laboring men have never been properly considered. I ask who is it that gave the laboring men in this country the right to obtain an education? Is it not a fact that until the Republican party came into control in this country the children of the poor men were allowed to go without any education? I believe the history of the Democratic party in this country establishes beyond doubt the proposition that the great mass of that organization that controled its action formerly believed the proper condition of the laboring man was that of a slave.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Does the gentleman know the Democratic party is the party which organized the free-school system in the State of Ohio?

Mr. KERR. I do not know so much about the State of Ohio as the gentleman does, but I do know that the people of the State of Ohio do not indorse the gentleman's position in regard to the wool schedule, and he knows they do not indorse his position.

Mr. REED. What is the gentleman's position in regard to wool? We were unable to find out the other day.

Mr. KERR. I understand he is going to vote for this bill. That defines his position.

Mr. JACKSON. Oh, no; the gentleman went with the Ohio delegation to protest against this proposition only a couple of years ago.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. KERR. I should like to have five minutes more, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa that he be allowed to proceed five minutes longer?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I make no objection provided the gentleman confines himself to the subject under consideration.

Mr. KERR. I have confined myself very closely to the subject and to the remarks of the gentleman.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in regard to this wool schedule, the history of the legislation of 1883 not only shows that the revenues of the Government have increased since that time from the tariff upon wool and upon the articles in the wool schedule, but in addition to that it shows the number of sheep in this country has been reduced over six millions. Is that what we are to expect from the other reductions? Is it not what we may reasonably expect from the line of policy pursued by that side of the House? The revenues will be increased and our own industries injured. The foreign importations of articles are to be increased and the articles of American manufacture and American production are to be decreased by the policy pursued by that side of the House.

Something was said by a member of this House regarding the position of my colleague from Iowa in reference to blankets. The argument of my colleague went to show this: That the poor man's blanket was as cheap to-day within 10 per cent. as it is in England. The argument of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCKINLEY] shows that the poor man's all-wool clothing is as cheap to-day in the United States, or within a trifle of it, as it is in Great Britain.

And that fact stands against all theories as a conclusive argument in favor of maintaining the present position. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORD] said something here to the effect that the abolition of the internal revenue was proposed to save the tariff schedules. I wish to call the attention of gentlemen to the position taken in this House two years ago by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] upon that question and to the thorough indorsement of that position by the people of some districts in which a distinct issue was made. In a discussion between the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. RANDALL, and the gentlemen from New York, Mr. Hewitt, the following took place:

Mr. HEWITT. Will the gentleman allow me a word? He has asked whether the measure introduced by the Committee on Ways and Means was in accordance with the pledges of the Chicago platform. I say that it was, and that is the question that I will go into his district and talk out with him and with his workingmen. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. RANDALL. I know well the conduct of the gentleman in the Chicago convention, and I know that neither he nor any other man subsequently went on the stump in his State or elsewhere and made declarations in the direction of the bill of the Ways and Means Committee as I conceive it to be. I not only know that, but I know also that, on the contrary, I was invited into his State and spoke there in the exact line of the declarations that I have made here and make now. [Applause on the Republican side.] I know more; I know that in the canvass last year which resulted in the election of Governor Hill they took care to invite me again, and they invited also many other men who agreed with me in sentiment as to the construction of the Chicago platform, while they failed to invite any man to speak there who thought as the gentleman from New York [Mr. Hewitt] now declares. [Applause on the Republican side.] And what was the result? The result was that the Democratic majority in the State of New York increased from something over 1,000 in 1884 to 11,000 in 1885, and it was not on any free-trade doctrine. [Laughter and applause.]

I declare that I am ready and willing to vote with anybody who will seek intelligently to reform the inequalities of the tariff. But how have we been met in this particular? We have had to either take the bill of the Ways and Means Committee or nothing. It has been asserted that we can not put upon a customs bill anything that looks to the repeal of internal taxation. I believe that the system of internal taxation is un-American and undemocratic. It was so pronounced by the fathers of our country, and I shall never weary in seeking its repeal in part or altogether. [Applause.]

The theory of the Democrats two years ago was that they could not combine a bill for the reduction of duties with one for the reduction of internal-revenue taxes. They have abandoned that position now.

Mr. BLAND. And still you are not satisfied.

Mr. KERR. Mr. Chairman, the men who took issue prominently with Mr. RANDALL, when they went home to their constituents were sent to the shades of private life. That was the case with Mr. Bragg; that was the case with Mr. Morrison, and it came within a few votes of being the case with several other prominent men upon this floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, a great deal has been said during this debate as to the pending measure being an assault upon American industries, and it seems to me that by dint of repetition on the part of these self-constituted champions of American industry and American labor, who offensively assume that every one who does not agree with them is an enemy of American industries, a false issue is being presented by this debate to the country. For my part, taking this bill in the average percentage of its protection to American industries, I can not for my life, from the old standpoint of Republicanism, see how it is that it is in the direction of an assault upon American industries; and when our self-constituted champions of American industries are driven into a corner on that point and forced to confess that a 40 per cent. tariff is ample for the purposes of protection they then seek refuge behind another statement that has no merit, which is that the bill is purely a sectional measure, and therefore ought to be rejected.

In this way there is an effort on the part of these men, who seem to think that the burden rests entirely upon their shoulders of defending American industries, to make this an unpopular measure before the people of the country. Now, I wish to say a few words in this connection with reference to the alleged sectional character of this bill. I do not like the bill in every part. I would like to see free sugar and free molasses and free lumber and free salt.

A MEMBER. How about rice?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Iowa. And free rice; and if that reduced the revenues of the country below an amount needed for the discharge of the obligation of the Government, I would re-enact the old tax upon the incomes of the rich men of this country and in that way revise our system of taxation. But, Mr. Chairman, I can not have my choice, and consequently I have to take such measures as I can find that do stand some show of practical success in the matter of reducing taxation.

But now, a word as to the sectional cry that has been raised against the pending measure. With all the imperfections that inhere in this bill I undertake to say that it is not as obnoxious to the charge of sectionalism as the law it seeks to revise, and which was enacted by its "friends," and that that is another false cry and another false issue set up by the self-constituted champions of American industries and the American people. I am an American, a thorough American, and expect to be for American institutions and American industries at every stage of my life, especially as against foreign industries.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Are you self-constituted in that line? [Laughter.]

Mr. ANDERSON, of Iowa. A fair retort. Yes, sir; I am self-constituted in that line. I have nothing to disguise and no false assumptions to defend. I am for protection here and elsewhere, whenever in my judgment it can be given without extorting to an unwarrantable extent from another class of the people who are not interested in the particular industry concerned. Talk about the pending bill being sectional! I want to say to gentlemen that it is a matter of history, so far as our tariff legislation is concerned, that the tariff has always been the most sectional measure upon the statute-book.

It is a legislative garment which was cut originally for the back of New England, and has never been enlarged by the patch-work which has been put upon it in recent years further than to extend it to the State of Pennsylvania. It is true that wool has come in; it is true that lumber in Michigan and Wisconsin has come in since Mr. Blaine twenty years ago inveighed on this floor against a tax on lumber as he would against a tax on bread. But the great body of the country that has been the beneficiary of these laws have been the States of New England, New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Iowa. I would like one or two minutes more.

Mr. KERR. Does the gentleman mean to say that Mr. Blaine ever inveighed against a tariff on lumber?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Iowa. He opposed the tax on lumber, and put his opposition on the ground that it was one of the necessaries of life, like bread.

Mr. KERR. Mr. Blaine's remarks were in regard to the internal-revenue tax on lumber.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to extending the time of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Iowa. A few words further on this sectional question; for it is not a question of party with me. While I have been a Republican all my life and wish that the position of the party was such that I could be in strict harmony with it now, I care more for the principle involved in this matter than I do for the consequences to the party.

Now, when gentlemen are talking about free sugar and free rice, I want to remind them of the fact that the men who cut this tariff garment for the country, and not the men who are now insisting on the revision, are those who put the tariff on sugar and rice, and put it higher than the Mills bill now puts it. Gentlemen here, let them come from where they may, whether the North or the South, the East or the West, had to tackle the question of the revision and modification of the tariff from the established order of things; and that established order was sectionalism in the extreme, as it had been fashioned and molded by its "friends." Gentlemen talk about the assault on manufactured lumber. That is one of the articles which have been referred to in order to show the sectional character of the measure. Gentlemen have talked about the lumber in Maine and Michigan and Wisconsin, seeming to forget in their zeal that several Southern States—among them Tennessee, Georgia, Alabama, and Arkansas—have the finest lumber forests in the world.

Gentlemen talk about putting wool on the free-list as another assault upon American industries; but they are as silent as the grave with reference to the fact that the great State of Texas, five times as large as the State of Ohio, has five times as many sheep scattered over her plains as the State of Ohio.

We hear a good deal in this connection about the reduction of duty on the metals, yet from what is said in this quarter you would never suspect that among the finest iron mines in the world are located in the Southern State of Alabama.

I say, then, Mr. Chairman, in the first place, that the charge that the pending measure is an assault on American industries is simply absurdly false; and the other charge—behind which, when driven from the first and principal charge, they find refuge—that this is a purely sectional measure, and therefore to be condemned and denounced at the North, is as false as the former, for this bill takes one-fifth of the $54,000,000, the amount of the entire tariff reduction, from sugar alone, which is entirely a Southern product, leaving out of consideration the primary fact that the existing law is purely a sectional measure, and the favored section the North and East chiefly. The truth of the matter is that these pretentious champions of protection, in advance of the appearance of the committee bill, took it for granted and heralded it to the country that it was to be a free-trade measure, and in that way they have diverted the attention of thousands and tens of thousands of their followers from even looking at the text of the bill itself to see whether the charge is true or not. These leaders know the force of party cries, and they are profiting by it here to the last degree. If we are to have tariff reduction, tariff duties, it seems to me, must at some point along the line be reduced.

In this connection, I want to say that our friends here, who arrogantly assume that they are the sole guardians of American industries, in assaulting the pending measure, are themselves open to criticism. They should remember the recent history and the record they have made with reference to this tariff question, which is that in the Forty-eighth Congress they united in support of a motion striking out the enacting clause in a bill for tariff revision, and on another occasion, in the Forty-ninth Congress, they joined in a motion to not consider the question of tariff at all.

This kind of record, coupled with the fact that the same interests have opposed the present measure as a whole and in detail, is not calculated to inspire the country with confidence in professions from this quarter as to what will be done either in the present or in future Congresses as to tariff reduction.

And, Mr. Chairman, in view of this record, it seems to me that the country should not accept without the closest scrutiny professions from such doubtful sources. And doing this the country will see that the charge of free trade and sectionalism in connection with the pending measure are both false and misleading charges, plied for the purpose of bringing about the same results that were brought about in the Forty-eighth and Forty-ninth Congresses by more direct and more honorable methods.

With our increased efficiency in all kinds of machinery, with our superior labor, one American laborer accomplishing in one day what it takes a foreign laborer a day and one-half to accomplish; with 3,000 miles of ocean transportation between our manufacturers and those most spoken of as their competitors, it is the grossest of misrepresentation to characterize as an assault on American industries a measure that grants them a 40 per cent. duty advantage over their competitors. The truth of this statement is so apparent that when attention is called to it the opponents of tax reduction concede it and assume that the measure is sectional and unfair in the adjustment of its details and therefore an unjust and dangerous measure.

But as we have already seen that the present law is sectional in its character, and that the Northeastern section of the Union has ever been the chief beneficiary under its provisions, we find this second charge as false and untenable as the first. It is no longer, in my opinion, a question of free trade or protection, but a question for protection to American industries on the one hand, or high war duties and unjust extortion in the interest of monopolies on the other. And I am at a loss to know what answer the member can make who votes against this measure in the absence of an honest, practical effort to supply a better one, when he is called to give an account of his stewardship to a constituency that have long been waiting for the redemption of pledges to revise the tariff and reduce taxation.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I have listened closely to the discussion on the Mills bill and observed the action of the Democratic majority in regard to the different amendments proposed, not in the spirit of political partisanship, but in the desire to honestly protect the industries of the nation from the clearly established mistakes of a majority of the Committee on Ways and Means until I am compelled against my desire, to conclude that all debate is useless. Valuable information is worthless. That the jury is packed, and regardless of arguments that are unanswerable, facts that can not be controverted, the Mills bill as reported by the majority of the Ways and Means Committee must be passed by this House with only such amendments and changes as political necessity requires to procure the votes necessary to complete the assassination of the business interests of this nation.

Under such circumstances arguments are useless, appeals are vain, and the language of denunciation that would do justice to the action of the majority would be so strong as to transgress the rules and perhaps insult the dignity of this House.

Therefore whatever I may say will be in the nature of a protest, and I do protest against the ruthless disregard of the interest of the farmers of Ohio and the Northwest, of the farmers of Texas, and the broad prairies of the Southwest in placing wool upon the free-list.

It is not denied that the farmers of the United States have more than $300,000,000 invested in the sheep industry of the country.

It is not denied that the effect of placing wool on the free-list will be the destruction of this branch of American husbandry. And if it is denied, I beg to submit the following clear and candid statement:

In the year 1885 the woolen manufacturers of the United States consumed about 424,404,109 pounds of wool, this being the largest amount ever consumed in any one year in the history of the Government, and larger than that consumed by Great Britain. Of this amount 129,084,958 pounds were imported.

Our imported wool came from Europe, Asia, Africa, South America, and Australia. In the year, 1886 Europe sent to this country 79,033,833 pounds of wool; South America sent 28,767,140; Australia, 7,960,443; Africa, 21,617,700. In 1887 we imported 12,767,850 pounds of wool from Asia.

Now, the question arises, can the American wool-grower successfully compete with these foreign countries in the production of wool to supply our factories? It is well known that in Asia, Africa, Australia, South America, and in some portions of Russia there are vast prairies and mountain-sides devoted to sheep-raising, where pasturing and feed cost little or nothing; where the sheep graze in the fields almost the entire year through; where they are sheared twice annually, the annual clip weighing from 6 to 8 pounds per sheep; where shepherds who tend the flocks can be hired in some of these countries for from 2 to 10 cents per day, and where the cost per pound of raising wool is not much more than one-quarter what it is in this country.

South America can place wool in the warehouses of New York, Boston, and Philadelphia, if there were no duties, at a cost of not more than 13 to 15 cents per pound, while in the older States of this country wool can not be raised and placed in these markets at less than 30 cents per pound. Most American fine wool is raised on high-priced land, worth from $40 to $100 an acre; hay is worth from $6 to $12 per ton; pasture lands costs from $4 to $8 per acre annually. The wages of employés vary from $12 to $25 per month, with board. Under such conditions competition with foreigners in supplying wool for our markets would be utterly impossible without adequate duties on wool; and if the duties are removed the wool and woolen industries in this country will be ruined, thus giving foreign wool-growers and manufacturers a monopoly of these industries, when the price of wool and woolen goods would immediately advance.

I ask my Democratic friends if they believe the farmers and flock-masters of the nation will silently submit to this most unjust discrimination against their interests. Their protests are already heard.

Texas has 6,800,000 sheep, and I respectfully invite the attention of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] to the following resolutions of his constituents in convention assembled:

The cattlemen's convention, at Waco, Tex., in Mr. MILLS's district, the Ninth, passed resolutions declaring that Mr. MILLS "does not represent the Ninth district nor the State of Texas in his position, and that his course tends to destroy the material industries of his constituency." We quote further from the text of the resolutions adopted by Mr. MILLS's wool-raising constituents:

"We deprecate the course of Mr. MILLS and put ourselves on record in hearty condemnation of his conduct and his bill.

"Forsaken by our Representative, we urge upon our Senators and Representatives in Congress to work against the Mills bill, and we call upon all good men from other States to protect Texas if her own Representatives fail to do so.

"Protection on raw wool is purely a protection to the producer, the farmer, as well as the sheepman, and should be maintained; and, finally,

"If Mr. MILLS persists in and urges the proposed removal of the duty on wool, it is the sense of this, a representative body of his constituency, that he abdicate his seat, and hereafter we will withhold our support at the ballot-box and elsewhere."

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MILLS obtained the floor, and said: I yield my five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. WILLIAMS. Missouri has 1,300,000 sheep, and I respectfully invite the attention of the eloquent gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] to the resolutions of the Missouri Wool-Growers' Association:

The Missouri Wool-Growers' Association at its last annual meeting adopted these resolutions among others:

"Whereas wool-growing adds to the welfare and happiness of the people by diversifying their occupations; and

"Whereas many natural resources of the country are thus utilized which would otherwise be wasted; and

"Whereas wool-growing not only adds to the comfort and prosperity of the whole people, but is essential to national independence and defense:

"Resolved, That it is the sense of this convention that wisdom and good public policy demand its extension and growth be fostered by every honorable means, either by the people or their representatives in legislatures assembled."

Mr. DOCKERY. Allow me to say that after two general discussions in my district on the question of reducing the duty on wool, the people of that district sustained me by increasing my majority from 1,800 to 4,219. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, that was only a compliment to the gentleman's skill as a canvasser [laughter and applause on the Republican side], and not an indication of their sentiment on this question. I am afraid when you go before the people this fall you will find that the majority will not have increased.

Ohio has four millions of sheep, and I respectfully request my Democratic colleagues to heed the respectful but indignant protests that come to them from the wool-growers of their respective districts; and I invite them to redeem the pledges made to the people of Ohio when in the Democratic State convention they adopted resolutions demanding the restoration of the wool tariff of 1867. Our Democratic friends claim that the prime object of the Mills bill is to reduce the revenues for the benefit of the people, and that it will reduce the revenue $78,000,000. If that was their object, and if they sincerely desire to reduce the revenues to the injury of the few for the benefit of the many, why not take sugar, which is an article of food, found on the tables of the rich and poor alike, one of the absolute necessities of life, and produced only in a limited area in the United States? It is paying a revenue of $56,000,000 annually. Tobacco is a product of the soil North and South, and is paying a tax of over $30,000,000. By exempting sugar from duty and abolishing the tax on tobacco the revenue would be reduced $86,000,000, and no profitable industry of American toil and labor would be injured or destroyed, while the helping hand of wise statesmanship would be felt and blessed in every household in this broad land of ours. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. KELLEY rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Pennsylvania rise?

Mr. KELLEY. I seek recognition from the Chair for two or three minutes only.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will proceed.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Chairman, I learn from the RECORD that on Saturday last the member from the Erie district of Pennsylvania, WILLIAM L. SCOTT, indulged in an unusually reckless fanfaronade, in the course of which, after referring to me by name, he said—

That neither age nor association can cultivate in one what nature has not given him—those traits of character which gentlemen recognize both in public and private life as the best types of true manhood.

If that member's public and private life are governed by the traits to which he alludes, it is matter of great happiness to me that nature did not bestow them upon me; and if he alludes to those traits which permit him, in pursuit of his own advantage, to pervert and falsify statements made by gentlemen, or which, according to his code, require a man who is forced to hear a conversation, all the essential facts of which are falsified and perverted by a party to such conversation, to abstain from exposing such falsification and perversion, I humbly thank my Creator for having protected me against the domination of such traits.

It is not my purpose to pursue the gentleman through his labyrinth of imaginary facts, but to say that in a letter addressed by Andrew Carnegie to James M. Swank, on the 16th of May last, which letter I had not seen when I submitted my correction of the statement made by the member from Erie, Mr. Carnegie confirms with precision my statement of the vital questions at issue, as appears from the following extracts from that letter:

In reply to your inquiry I beg to state exactly what occurred between Mr. SCOTT and myself in the room of the Ways and Means Committee, at Washington.

I said to Mr. SCOTT: "You have been making speeches around the country saying that I would not consent to become an American citizen, and that I was a foreigner profiting by the high tariff." Mr. SCOTT said that he had made that statement "under a misapprehension," and he now knew "it was not true." He had "read Triumphant Democracy," and knew that I was an intensely patriotic American. He promised not to repeat it.

I said: "There is another statement you have made which is equally incorrect, namely, that I took a million and a half of dollars of dividends from my manufacturing interests in one year."

* * * * * * *

So far from ever having drawn a million and a half from our firm in any one year, I have never drawn a million, nor half a million, nor any sum approaching it.

In view of these concurrent statements by Mr. Carnegie and myself no question of veracity between the member from Erie and myself can be made. But there were in the committee-room three gentlemen who can not be heard on this floor. They were Mr. Uriah H. Painter,

Mr. Jesse H. Weirick, both of whom were in positions to hear what occurred, and Mr. Talbot, the accomplished clerk of the committee, who was, I think, too far removed from the place at which the interview was held to hear what was said. The member from Erie has given us his promise to endeavor to have the statements of these gentlemen printed. I hope he will redeem his promise. They are well known as gentlemen of veracity, and as his allegations are now expressly contradicted by two witnesses, Mr. Carnegie and myself, the publication of statements from these gentlemen will show with increased emphasis why I am so glad to have escaped the dominant traits of his character.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, in response to what the gentleman from Ohio said a few moments ago, with reference to certain resolutions adopted at Waco, Tex., I beg to say on behalf of my colleague, Colonel MILLS, that I do not think that was a very large or representative convention which passed the resolutions the gentleman read, nor do I believe it was composed very largely of representative Democrats.

His course has been subsequently indorsed by the assembled Democracy of Texas, and ratified by the national convention of the Democratic party.

As an evidence of how my distinguished colleague is considered in his own district I beg to read a brief extract from a recent daily paper published in my State, which contains the proceedings of one of his county conventions held on the 11th instant, and a very large convention at that, and I find this approval and indorsement of my colleague by the Democrats of Falls County:

The name of Hon. ROGER Q. MILLS fully aroused the unterrified, and the building resounded again and again to cheers, and the delegation to the Congressional convention was instructed to cast the vote of Falls County for him first, last, and all the time.

This is but the precursor of what the other counties will do in that Congressional district. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to discuss the free-wool question now distinctively as free wool, but to illustrate the effect of the adoption of this schedule by some observations upon an experiment which we have tried and of which we have a sufficient account to understand its good effects. In 1872 Congress put raw hides on the free-list. We had then the same predictions about placing raw hides on the free-list that my distinguished friend from Ohio, who has just taken his seat, makes, and which other gentlemen also have made with reference to free wool. It was not quite so large an industry, but it was to be ruined utterly, as the wool industry is to be ruined by putting wool upon the free-list. We have had free raw hides now for sixteen years. We have seen the experiment tried. It is not a matter of conjecture or of prophesy, but of history. It stood related to American industries almost precisely as free wool does to-day, though somewhat less important. Every industry connected with leather has prospered under this experiment.

I hold in my hand the tables prepared by the customs office, which show this result: We have now about 20,000,000 more of population than we had in 1872. It was estimated then that our population was about 40,000,000. It is now estimated at over 60,000,000.

Mr. MCMILLIN. A little over 60,000,000.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. So there has been an increase of consumers of the various manufactures of leather to the extent of over 20,000,000 persons. In 1872 we imported $11,879,000 of leather. In 1887 we imported $10,936,000 worth; that is, the American manufacturers of leather goods supplied both the twenty-odd millions of increase of our population as well as those formerly supplied. Every additional consumer of every form of leather manufacture is provided for by an American manufacturer. As the people increase in population the American manufacturer of leather increases the amount of his product.

But that is only part of the story. In 1872 we exported $3,684,020 worth of the manufactures of leather and $1,445,178 worth of hides and skins. We now export $10,436,138 worth of the manufactured article and $765,655 worth of hides and skins—that is, we not only supplied the additional twenty million, but we have increased our exportation nearly 300 per cent. Not only that, but we have increased our importations of raw hides from fourteen millions in 1872 to twenty-four millions in 1887—that is, we have given that much more work to American workingmen. We have not only used every hide produced in America except $765,000 worth, but we have increased our importations of raw hide nearly 100 per cent., which represents that much more labor given to the American laborer, that much more wage earned by the American wage-worker, and that much more profit by the American manufacturer.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be given five minutes more. If I can be recognized I will yield my time to the gentleman.

There was no objection.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Not only that, Mr. Chairman, but the importations of leather are divided almost equally into two classes. We have ceased to import almost all sorts of leather save gloves, of which we import $4,184,877 worth out of the ten million dollars' worth and odd of importation—nearly 50 per cent. We import $6,195,479.08 calf skins and skins for morocco and the upper dressed leather; those articles which are in an unfinished condition and have to be manufactured in America, so that our whole importation of leather are of gloves which we do not make, or are supposed not to make as well as they are made in Paris or elsewhere, and of leather which is manufactured in America. So that the result of this experiment is that the tanner has increased in prosperity by tanning twice as much foreign raw hide; that the manufacturer has increased his manufactures over 100 per cent.; that the importations have decreased until they have reached a point where they can probably decrease no longer, because we import finer calf-skins and morocco than we make, and import kid gloves and nothing else substantially, and our exportations have increased 300 per cent.

By this means we have built up a trade with South America and elsewhere, where we buy these raw hides. We sell to them our manufactures. In increasing the exportation of our goods we have increased our commerce with the countries to which we sell, and in purchasing the raw hides we have increased our commerce with the nations from which we buy.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Will the gentleman from Kentucky allow me to call his attention to the fact that the illustration is hardly fair? The hide is an incident of another great industry in this country, the production of meat being the main thing.

Mr. MCMILLIN. So is wool.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. While wool is the basis of an industry and a separate industry itself, in which the carcass of the sheep is only an incident. The cases are hardly upon all fours.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Undoubtedly the gentleman's criticism is in part just and in part unjust. The analogy to which I desire to call attention is absolutely on all fours. It is that the introduction of free raw material necessarily has these consequences: First, the increased importation of the raw material in lieu of the finished product by which the amount of labor is increased, the amount of wage is increased, and the amount of profit to the manufacturer is increased. Secondly, that the importation of raw material increases in such a way that we find a market for our manufactured goods and sell our finished products to those countries that have the crude material, and buy from them their raw material. In the third place, if we will keep up that experiment, as has been done, it increases in exact proportion two things: First, the increased consumption of the country, so that we may furnish the entire amount needed by that increased consumption; and second, the increased exportation as rapidly as our commercial relations will allow it to be done. There is some difference between leather and wool on both sides.

We produce leather in America as incidental to the production of provisions. So, in a certain sense, do we produce wool. The sheep as food is as important as are cattle; it is growing in value in that aspect, and one of the largest profits derived from sheep-raising is in the sale of lambs in our great markets. It is also important because the hide upon the sheep, the sheep-skin, becomes an article of commerce and comes under this head of leather; and in the third place many of the woolens which we use in America are made in part of foreign wools, because as to these fabrics American wool must have foreign wool mixed with it. We are therefore in the condition that we can not produce all the wool we need. We produce, in round numbers, only 265,000,000 of pounds out of about 600,000,000 of pounds that we need.

Counting the finished product and the wool that comes in in the raw state, and counting the adulterants which the excessive protective duties require to be put into our clothing, we use about 300,000,000 pounds more than we raise.

Now, I have used this leather illustration because it illustrates what we claim will be the result of the operation of this bill in relation to wool. If you introduce free wool there may be a temporary depression in the price of American wool as there was a temporary depression in the price of raw hides, but immediately the reaction will begin. We shall begin to increase the amount of goods made by the mixture of our own wools with the cheap wools brought from abroad, wools which will come in at the price which they now cost the English manufacturer, wool which can be freely selected in all the markets of the world instead of being chosen as now for reasons connected with the tariff.

Those wools will come in, I say, at a price so cheap that there will be an increased demand for American wools, precisely as there is now for American raw hides. We will continue to import wool somewhat in the quantity that we do now, but in its raw state instead of the finished product. Instead of thousands of thousands of yards of woolens being made in England and brought here, fabrics on which the English wage-worker has earned his wage, the English manufacturer his profit, the English ship-owner his freightage, the material will come to this country in the shape of free raw wool, to be mixed with our own wools, and in the manufacture of the fabric our own laborer will obtain the wage, and our own woolen factories instead of running only six or seven months in the year will run the whole twelve months; our wool-growers will be prosperous because our woolen manufacturers will be prosperous and will give a stable market to our wool-growers. We shall then drive from the American market the foreign manufacturer, and some man standing here in Congress as I stand now will present figures similar in nature to show that our woolen industry, under the stimulus of free wool demonstrated the value of that system which furnishes to labor, free from burden or exaction, the material which it turns to human use.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. Chairman, more time has been consumed in the discussion of this question on this side of the House than on the other, and I ask that the time of the gentleman from Kentucky be extended.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. As my friend goes on I want to say to him that the English manufacturer does not adopt the view which he presents here.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. It may be possible that he does not; but if the gentleman means that the English manufacturer wants our market in the sense that it is to his advantage that we should have free wool, I utterly deny it, and I can produce the evidence of Sir Lion Playfair, Mr. Gladstone, and other great thinkers to the effect that the reason the United States does not successfully compete in the markets of the world with England and the other European nations, with their enormous armaments, their enormous taxation, and their great armies subtracted from their productive population, is because of our unfortunate, unwise, foolish, protective laws, that so long as we manacle our hands and chain our feet they will run ahead of us in the great progressive industrial march, but that as soon as we unshackle our own limbs, bring the crude material in free, and put the machinery at work which will transform that crude material into the finished product, we shall be masters of the situation.

We propose by this bill to do that, to do in relation to wool precisely as we have done heretofore in relation to leather. As our population increases our manufactures will increase; as we increase our manufactures our exports will increase; our ships will be seen again in foreign ports; there will be American merchants with balances in foreign commercial cities; there will be American vessels owned by American capital carrying American cargoes to foreign nations and bringing back in return cargoes of crude materials to be sold to the American manufacturer, to be mixed with American materials, to be worked up into finished fabrics by American workingmen, the profits of which will remain in American pockets. That is the Democratic doctrine. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

In connection with the views I have here presented, I desire to have printed the following tables:

Mr. WHITING, of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. ALLEN] in his remarks on Thursday last said, regarding my colleague [Mr. TARSNEY] and myself, as follows:

If these gentlemen think they can with impunity strike at every industry in the great State of Michigan as they seem to think they can, they will find out more about that after the election than perhaps they know now.

Mr. Chairman, it is my opinion that by far the greater portion of the people, both in his district and in my own, as well as in every other district of our State, desire cheaper lumber, cheaper dairy salt, cheaper articles manufactured from copper, and cheaper clothing made from wool. I think the gentleman has not a single saw-mill, or a salt-block, or a copper mine in his district, and it occurs to me that if he opposes a policy which is of vital importance to the greatest wealth-producers of our State, the farmers, possibly he may be a wiser man after election.

The gentleman may have a very different idea of their needs and of the discrimination of the tariff against them than I have, but I have been in such relations with the farmers in my vicinity, having sold them goods for twenty years, that I am thoroughly convinced that there is no other industry which receives so small compensation for its investments and labor as agriculture, and I can not be swerved from the conclusion that this condition is the direct result of a law.

I do not believe that God designed that the farmer because he tills the soil should work harder and receive less than others with smaller investments, less judgment, and shorter hours. A slight desire to know the truth reveals the fact that the tariff laws discriminate very unjustly against him; 33.70 per cent. of the wheat crop was exported in 1887, the year ending July 30.

Had not the farmer had a foreign market for this surplus his wheat would have been almost valueless to him. Did he get any more for what he sold here than for what he sent abroad? Certainly not. The price of his entire crop was made in the open markets of the world, while for everything he buys he pays an increased price, for the reason that the very competition which he meets in selling is restricted when he comes to buy.

I claim that the farmer can not stand this always. Neither can we have general prosperity if we continue to impoverish that especial great branch of American industry which God designs to be both profitable and honorable. The sop of protection on wool, together with the claim that protection furnishes diversity and rotation of crops, will not longer delude the farmer. He has seen the lumbermen in Michigan grow very rapidly rich; he has seen the buyer and the transporter of his crops make more profit out of them than himself.

He knows that wool-raising is not very profitable, even with a high tariff, and that the advanced price he gets he has to part with as soon as he goes to the store to buy his woolen goods. Perchance is he able to buy woolens, so unprofitable in his business? Here is a farmer's opinion of wool in Illinois:

A chance is now offered for some all-wool, high-tariff plutocrat to make a spec. Isaac C. Whitlock, of Elwood Township, Vermillion County, owns fifty fine sheep whose fleeces he offers to donate, tied up nicely with protected twine, to any one who will furnish his family with necessary goods one year, duty free, not including whisky and tobacco. We rise to remark that farmers read and post themselves nowadays. This proposition remains good while the present tariff remains.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that when gentlemen upon the other side attack the Mills bill and offer various amendments to it, when it is known that their platform commits them to free whisky and tobacco, rather than the surrender of any part of the protective system, they are simply trying to catch votes, and I believe that no one appreciates more keenly than themselves the awkward position which the prompt, courageous action of President Cleveland, and the long-continued neglect of duty on their own part, now places them in.

It is my opinion that through their absolute inability to meet the wants in Michigan they will not be able to hold the State in the coming Presidential election, and it would not surprise me if they did not have to exceed two Republican members from Michigan in the Fifty-first Congress. God knows that they should not have any.

Mr. HERMANN. Mr. Chairman, it has been found a vain hope during the consideration of this measure to accomplish any beneficial changes as they have been moved by this side of the Chamber. I am therefore admonished in advance that the brief observations I now have the honor to submit on the radical changes proposed in the schedule of duties on foreign wool importation will be without avail. My purpose, therefore, in rising at this time is rather to give voice to the prevailing sentiments of my constituency in protest of the legislation contemplated and which vitally affects one of their leading and most valued industries. In the form of petitions and memorials they are already of record.

The profound anxiety of our people is at once appreciated when it is understood that my State ranks fourth among the wool-growing States. California is first on the roll, with 5,462,728 sheep. Texas follows next in order, with 4,523,739 head; Ohio third, with 4,106,622, and Oregon fourth, with 2,930,123 head, the value of the same being $4,987,069 for this one State. The number of sheep in the three Pacific States amount to 9,053,847, to which add 2,127,783 in the Territories of Washington, Idaho, and Montana west of the Rocky Mountains, and we have on the Pacific Slope more than one-fourth of the total sheep flocks of the entire nation. This conveys, at the outset, a proof of the great importance of the wool industry to that section of the Union. Nor does this measure the possible maximum of its growth. The advancement of the last few years afford us assurances of a continued and greater development for the future.

With free wool into the United States and a competition with the cheapest of all cheap labor of the world it does not require argument to demonstrate that the cheaper product must soon supplant the more costly, and in the end we shall approach, and rapidly too, the destruction throughout the whole nation of a product which now yields to the country annually $75,000,000. To this may be added the disappearance of the flocks themselves which are valued at $90,000,000 and which now produce our mighty wool yield. That this will result, we have only to recur to past experience in our affairs. By the reduction of duties in the tariff act of 1883 we trace a falling off in the number of sheep from 50,626,626 in 1884, when the act took effect, to 44,759,314 head in 1887, only three years following. With free foreign wool they will all go. And what was the further consequences of this unfortunate reduction?

Our foreign wool importations increased from 70,575,478 pounds in 1883 to 129,084,958 pounds in 1886. The ostensible purpose of the pending bill is to reduce the revenue. If these were as great in amount on wool as are the duties on sugar, less surprise could exist, for the foreign wool duty only amounted to $5,899,817 last year.

It is for this, then, the great sacrifice must be made! To save sugar yielding $15,000,000 per annum we are yet to pay $45,000,000 under the proposed reduction, while to destroy wool yielding $75,000,000 to the country we avoid duties of about $6,000,000. And yet this is asserted to be unbiased, impartial legislation! Some have the effrontery to dignify it as statesmanship! But there is another injury which must follow this legislation. It is in the diminution of the meat supply, and the consequent increase of price. Mutton is now one of the cheapest as well as most nourishing of foods, and hence more in reach of the laboring man and the poorer classes. Reduce the price of wool and there will be less inducement to raise the mutton sheep. The cost will be greater. If it be argued that free wool brings cheaper clothing, it may be replied that the present cheaper cost of meat amply counterbalances the difference in duty on clothing. In this view of the matter it is not alone the wool-grower who is interested, but every member of society. The mutton sold in our home market annually amounts to $15,000,000.

Of the millions of American citizens who are now profitably engaged in sheep husbandry, and who must suffer a sacrifice largely of capital and entirely of occupation and employment, it is needless to comment. The loss to the country as well as the individuals in the wages received will be severely felt. The immense revenue now left with us and the property and earnings which go to make American homes prosperous, contented, and industrious will be transferred to foreign lands—to Australia, New Zealand, and South America, there to enrich English nabobs and Spanish grandees, and to feed, clothe, and shelter the cheap and degraded herders of those climes.

Their flocks will produce the wool for our consumption and manufacture. They will derive the profits and receive the wages now so richly the portion of our own people. Seventy-five millions of dollars, now our own earnings, must annually be sent out of the country to replace the destroyed product with a foreign supply necessary for our home demand, and this in the face of the fact that we are to-day the second greatest wool-producing nation on the globe, and with the further fact that we consume all the wool we produce. It is as Mr. Blaine so tersely and so well said:

To break down wool-growing and be dependent on foreign countries for the blankets under which we sleep and coats that cover our backs is not wise policy for the National Government to enforce.

But this will not close the enumeration of our probable losses. Much of our domain in the West utilized by wool-growers, and especially that portion distant from lines of transportation, is at present unfit for any other use. In the dry seasons water is distant and scarce, the soil incapable of tillage, and unfitted for the occupancy of the agriculturist, and yet a species of grass is found indigenous to the soil which affords nourishment to the sheep. To these waste and desert plains the herders resort with immese flocks, and it is on such otherwise valueless lands that a large per cent. of the American wool is produced and annually finds its way to the home market to become the manufactured fabric for our people. With free foreign wool to the American market and competition with a product of cheap foreign sheep, cheap foreign lands, cheaper foreign labor, and low foreign interest we render utterly useless a large part of our Western domain, and can say thrice farewell to the American wool industry.

It is such practical reflections as these which appeal more directly to the classes interested. You may theorize until doomsday upon the manufactures of our country which are to be stimulated to increased product of fabric by reason of cheaper wool and hence as a result an increased demand and better prices, but such absurdities are soon detected and react upon the designing or deluded politician who utters them. Lower duties and higher prices are demonstrated in practice to be a fallacy. No greater delusion was ever preached. The mere attempt at this time to lower the duties has so agitated the market that prices have reached a most unprofitable minimum. The wool-grower sadly turns his back upon the market and breathes inprecations upon the authors of his injury. Five cents loss in the market on every pound of his wool product does not inspire him with admiration for free trade. If he is a member of the dominant party his ardor is gone. He feels it to be his enemy, not his friend; the friend of England, not of America: the destroyer of home industries, the ally of foreign interests.

It is thus the people of the nation are thinking to-day and quietly resolving in November next to administer such a rebuke to free trade and by such a vote as has never had an equal before it.

Why, sir, what better illustration of popular condemnation of the pending measure can be found than in the vote recently cast in my own State? About one-fourth of the opposition evidently united with the Republicans to storm free trade. From a Republican plurality of 1,635 two years ago it is 7,504 plurality now. Over 60,000 votes were cast. It is humorously asserted that even the sheep voted on our side, for as it is said in holy writ: "A stranger will they not follow, but will flee from him, for they know not the voice of strangers."

The issue between the parties was sharply made. Shall the radical changes proposed in the Mills bill be approved? Shall the future policy of this Government be protection or free trade? The Democratic State Convention resolved—

That we most earnestly and unqualifiedly indorse the policy of tariff revision and a reduction of the surplus revenues to the needs of the Government economically administered, as set forth in the President's last annual message to Congress.

The Republican convention resolved:

That the policy of the Democratic administration which would place wool and lumber on the free-list, and woolen goods on the highly protected list; cotton-ties on the free-list, and other similar hoop-iron on the protected list, and which policy would continue the collection of $50,000,000 on sugar each year, while at the same time the majority applaud and claim to carry out the President's idea, that a tariff tax is a robbery of the people, constitutes a piece of unparalleled political dishonesty, having for its sole object the success of the Democratic party at the next election, even at the expense of the political destruction of many of our most important agricultural and manufacturing industries.

The leading Democratic paper of the State, on the day preceding the election, said:

They are trying to scare the Democracy of Oregon with the wolf-cry of wool. We can not afford longer to defer to the selfishness or blindness of even so valuable a class of men as the wool-growers. They must be taught, as many of them already understand, that an excessive high tariff is a curse rather than a benefit, even to them.

The Oregonian, the leading Republican paper of the State, said:

Until Oregon can be made to understand why Cleveland took a club to pound the wool industry to death while he continues to pat and stroke and feed the Louisiana-tiger sugar monopoly, Oregon will not be carried by the Democracy.

Every county and precinct was closely canvassed. Both parties sent out their ablest exponents, and eloquent orators from other States participated. Oregon was regarded as the battle ground whereon was to be fought the first conflict in the Presidential year for protection. This State was the precursor in the race. Shall American industries and American labor and American homes be protected? This was the rallying cry all along the line. The battle ended, and such a victory on a fair vote and an honest count was seldom before witnessed in our State elections. It took the place of an angry uprising of an indignant people. They resolved to administer such a rebuke as should resound throughout the nation. In defiant tones they roll back their answer: "Our industries and property shall not be destroyed."

It was a contest of long wool versus free wool. There are two shearings in that State, one in the spring and one in the fall. The June shearing was had with the yield referred to, and the next will be in November, with even more prolific results. Following the great victory the Wasco Sun, a prominent Democratic paper, said:

There are no doubt many reasons that could be advanced showing why the Democracy was defeated. As they are defeated, we do not propose to hold an inquest on the remains, partly because there are no remains. They were kicked by a mule. We have been downed handsomely, but we will be on hand when the next round is called. There is no denying the fact that large Republican gains are due to the effect of the Mills bill, and to us this result seems to measure the sentiment of the people on the question of the tariff, and as might makes right in this case, Oregon can be set down as being opposed to a reduction of it.

And the defeated Democrotic nominee for Congress, who ably canvassed the State, also says:

I attribute our defeat principally to the platform adopted at the Democratic State convention. * * * The result of the election shows that Oregon does not want free trade.

Much twaddle has been indulged in by free-traders to divert attention from the significance of this result, and every cause but the real one has been suggested for such a protest, some gentlemen on this floor becoming so reckless as to charge that railroad influences and lumber trusts and money controlled the result. In emphatic denial of such ingenious, yet desperate alternatives, I submit the plain issues on which the conflict was fought and then the candid acknowledgment of the Democratic leaders in the State as to the real cause. My State has neither lumber trusts nor political railroad jobbers, either great or small, and no election was ever more perfectly free from the corrupt use of monetary influences.

The true result must therefore be received unchallenged, and as like effects are threatened by the Mills bill upon similar and other industries in other States, let this decisive victory point a moral. Let it be the ominous index reaching out to that great tribunal which shall sit in November to pass in judgment upon the issues now being made up. Let it sternly admonish those misguided statesmen on the opposite side of this Chamber that the dignity of American labor is cherished by the American people and that the terrible calamity with which they threaten our marvelous resources and rich and varied industries must not and shall not have sway.

Mr. MILLS (at 1 o'clock p. m). Mr. Chairman, the time for taking the vote has arrived.

The CHAIRMAN. By an order of the committee heretofore made debate on this paragraph of the bill is exhausted. The Chair, under the arrangement which has been made, will assume that the division of this question has been asked. The Clerk will read that part of the bill now to be voted on.

The Clerk read as follows:

All wools, hair of the alpaca, goat, and other like animals.
Wools on the skin.
Woolen rags, shoddy, mungo, waste, and flocks.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on striking out what has been read.

Mr. BOOTHMAN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I wish to inquire whether the amendment offered by myself on the 11th instant is not first in order and must not first be disposed of?

Mr. MILLS. There was unanimous consent that we should take a vote on this question.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment to which the gentleman refers was printed in the RECORD by unanimous consent, but was not considered as offered in its order. The first amendment submitted was that by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PUGSLEY], who moved to strike out the whole of section 3. That amendment is divisible, and the vote is now being taken on that part of the bill which relates to free wool.

Mr. BOOTHMAN. But I desire to call attention to the fact that my motion is to strike out and insert—a proposition to perfect the bill, which should have precedence over a motion merely to strike out.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's motion is to strike out and insert—not to perfect the portion proposed to be stricken out. The motion to strike out takes precedence of the motion to strike out and insert.

Mr. WILKINS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I would like to know whether any one has called for a division on striking out lines 4, 5, and 6.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PUGSLEY] moved to strike out the whole section.

Mr. WILKINS. I call for a division of the question, so as to take the vote separately on striking out lines 4, 5, and 6.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the pending question. Those lines have just been read.

The question being taken on striking out lines 4, 5, and 6 as read, there were—ayes 93, noes 122. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. JACKSON, Mr. LEHLBACH, and others called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Can there not be an understanding that a vote shall be taken in the House on this proposition?

Mr. DOCKERY and others. Regular order.

Mr. REED and Mr. MILLS were appointed as tellers.

The committee again divided; and there were—ayes 102, noes 120.

So the motion to strike out was rejected. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I wish to say that I am paired on this question with my colleague from Ohio [Mr. CAMPBELL]. I do not know how he would vote on this proposition. If he were here, I should vote in the affirmative.

Mr. MILLS. I move the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out lines 56 to 59, as follows:

"All carpets and carpetings, druggets, bockings, mats, rugs, screens, covers, hassocks, bedsides of wool, flax, cotton, hemp, jute, or parts of either, or other material, 30 per cent. ad valorem."

And insert:

"Hemp and jute carpetings, 6 cents per square yard; floor matting and floor mats, exclusively of vegetable substances, 20 per cent. ad valorem; all other carpets and carpetings, druggets, bockings, mats, rugs, screens, covers, hassocks, bedsides of wool, flax, cotton, or parts of either, or other material, 40 per cent. ad valorem."

Mr. REED. Who offers that?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS], the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. REED. Is that the Connecticut amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not know.

Mr. MILLS. The object of this proposition is to restore the duty on hemp and jute carpetings to 6 cents per square yard, and on matting composed exclusively of vegetable substances to 20 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. REED. I asked if this was the Connecticut amendment.

Mr. MILLS. No, that is the Texas amendment.

Mr. REED. But it is for Connecticut?

Mr. MILLS. It will do for Connecticut and all the rest of the country.

Mr. REED. I want to keep run of these things.

Mr. MILLS. Let us have a vote.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I ask a separate vote on each of these paragraphs.

The CHAIRMAN. This is a motion to strike out and insert, which is not divisible.

Mr. FARQUHAR. But the amendment is divisible. It proposes to insert one ad valorem as to several different classes of goods.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not help that.

Mr. FARQUHAR. But certainly it is in order for the House to have a separate vote upon jute goods and carpetings, which are totally separate matters.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion to strike out and insert is indivisible; the question must be taken as one vote.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Then I move to amend that last paragraph by inserting "50 per cent. ad valorem."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can move that as an amendment to the amendment.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. FARQUHAR to strike out at the end of the amendment of Mr. MILLS the words "40 per cent. ad valorem" and insert "50 per cent. ad valorem," the motion was rejected.

Mr. LODGE. I move to amend the amendment by inserting after the clause "floor matting and floor mats, exclusively of vegetable substances, 20 per cent. ad valorem," the following:

Provided, That on mats or mattings made wholly or in part of cocoa yarn or cocoa fiber or rattan, 10 cents per square foot on mats and 15 cents per square yard on mattings.

Mr. LODGE. My amendment to the amendment provides that on mats or mattings made wholly or in part of cocoa yarn, or cocoa fiber, or rattan, shall be at the rate of 10 cents per square foot on mats, and 15 cents per square yard on matting. I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, that this industry, not a large industry, has had hard work to live between competition of our own prisons and the competition of cooly labor of India. This is an amendment offered in behalf of the manufacturers and the representatives of the mat-makers' union to equalize prices of labor here and in England; and I desire simply to put on record their statement of the case and of the comparative wages paid in India and in this country, showing that a failure to relieve these men will destroy the industry, compel them to seek other employment, and give the entire market to the Calcutta manufacturers.

The statement to which I have referred is as follows:

July 10, 1888.

DEAR SIR: We are in thorough sympathy with the "Mat Makers' Protective Association" in their effort to have the duty adjusted, that their labor may be protected from unequal competition with the cooly labor of India and the convict labor of Europe. The present duty of 20 per cent. ad valorem does not equalize the cost of foreign labor with the labor of this country engaged in our industry, and for several years our factories have been running on half time, not having a market for our full production.

The annexed schedule shows the relative cost of cocoa mats and cocoa matting made here and in India, and from this exhibit you will see that it takes a specific duty of 10 cents per square foot on mats, and 15 cents per square yard on matting to place American labor and capital on a par with foreign. We therefore hope you will use every effort to have the tariff bill so amended as to provide for a specific duty of 10 cents per square foot on mats and 15 cents per square yard on matting made wholly or in part of cocoa yarn, or cocoa fiber, or rattan, and that cocoa yarn, cocoa fiber, and rattan remain on the free-list.

Yours, very respectfully,

The question recurred on Mr. LODGE'S amendment to the amendment.

Mr. LODGE demanded a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 86, noes 95.

So Mr. LODGE'S amendment to the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts. I move to strike out, in line 33, on page 27——

The CHAIRMAN. That amendment is not now in order.

The question recurred on Mr. MILLS'S amendment, and it was agreed to.

Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts. I move, in line 12 in the paragraph providing for 40 per cent. ad valorem, to strike out "shawls" and to insert in line 33 providing for 45 per cent. ad valorem, the word "shawls;" so it will read—

Clothing, shawls, ready-made, and wearing apparel, etc.

Mr. Chairman, the purpose of the amendment is to provide for a certain line of shawls in the manufacture of which a large amount of hand labor is employed by transferring it to the schedule providing for ready-made clothing. This class of shawls is as much an article of clothing as any of the articles enumerated in that paragraph. As the manufacturers are obliged to have this hand labor in the manufacture of these shawls this change ought to be made.

The amendment of Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts, was disagreed to.

Mr. BOOTHMAN. I submit the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend line 2, on page 27, by striking out the words "there shall be admitted" and in lieu thereof insert the words "all wools, hair of the alpaca, goat, and other like animals;" and after the words "when imported," in said line 2, insert the following:

"Shall be divided, for the purpose of fixing the duties to be charged thereon, into the three following classes:

"Class 1, clothing wools.—That is to say, merino, mestiza, metz, or metis wools, or other wools of merino blood, immediate or remote, Down clothing wools and wools of like character with any of the preceding, including such as have been heretofore usually imported into the United States from Buenos Ayres, New Zealand, Australia, Cape of Good Hope, Russia, Great Britain, Canada, and elsewhere, and also including all wools not hereinafter described or designated in classes 2 and 3.

"Class 2, combing wools.—That is to say, Leicester, Cotswold, Lincolnshire, Down combing wools, Canada long wools, or other like combing wools of English blood, and usually known by the terms herein used, and also all hair of the alpaca, goat, and other like animals.

"Class 3, carpet wools and other similar wools.—Such as Donskoi, native South American, Cordova, Valparaiso, native Smyrna, and including all such wools of like character as have been heretofore usually imported into the United States from Turkey, Greece, Egypt, Syria, and elsewhere.

"The duty on wools of the first class which shall be imported washed shall be twice the amount of the duty to which they would be subjected if imported unwashed; and the duty on wools of all classes which shall be imported scoured shall be three times the duty to which they would be subjected if imported unwashed. The duty upon wool of the sheep, or hair of the alpaca, goat, and other like animals, which shall be imported in any other than ordinary condition, as now and heretofore practiced, or shall be changed in its character or condition for the purpose of evading the duty, or which shall be reduced in value by the admixture of dirt or any other foreign substance, shall be twice the duty to which it would be otherwise subject.

"Wools of the first class, the value whereof at the last port or place whence exported to the United States, excluding charges in such port, shall be 30 cents or less per pound, 10 cents per pound; wools of the same class, the value whereof at the last port or place whence exported to the United States, excluding charges in such port, shall exceed 32 cents per pound, 12 cents per pound, and in addition thereto 10 per cent. ad valorem.

"Wools of the second class, and all hair of the alpaca, goat, and other like animals, the value whereof, at the last port or place whence exported to the United States, excluding charges in such port, shall be 32 cents or less per pound, 10 cents per pound, and in addition thereto 11 per cent. ad valorem; wools of the same class, the value whereof at the last port or place whence exported to the United States, excluding charges in such port, shall exceed 33 cents per pound, 12 cents per pound, and in addition thereto 10 per cent. ad valorem.

"Wools of the third class, the value whereof at the last port or place whence exported to the United States, excluding charges in such port, shall be 12 cents or less per pound, 3 cents per pound; wools of the same class, the value whereof at the last port or place whence exported to the United States, excluding charges in such port, shall exceed 12 cents per pound, 6 cents per pound.

"Wools on the skin, the same rates as other wools, the quantity and value to be ascertained under such rules as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe."

Also further amend by striking out lines 3, 4, 5, and 6.

Mr. BOOTHMAN demanded a division on his amendment.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 59, noes 95.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. MILLS. I move to strike out in line 1 "July" and insert in lieu thereof "October;" so it will read:

SEC. 3. On and after October 1, 1888, etc.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MILLS. I move, in line 7, to strike out "October" and insert "January," and to strike out "eight" and insert "nine;" so it will read:

On and after January 1, 1889, in lieu of the duties heretofore imposed, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LONG. On page 29, line 55, I move to insert the following.

The Clerk read as follows:

Plushes composed wholly or in part of wool, worsted, hair of the alpaca, goat, or other animals, 60 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. LONG. Mr. Chairman, this is comparatively a new industry. Under this bill the Committee on Ways and Means made raw material free, which reduces the cost of the cloth about 8 cents a yard. That, of course, is for the benefit of the manufacturer, but by removing the specific duty on manufactured goods they have reduced the cost of the imported article from 28 to 30 cents a yard. The result of that is, they discriminate against the American manufacturer to the extent of the difference, which is 22 or 20 cents a yard.

This is comparatively a new industry. It has been established some six or seven years. For the first four or five years it has been run at a loss. Since then it has begun to be profitable. But the result to the American manufacturer has been to reduce the cost of the imported article. Under the American manufacture the price has been reduced. The business is getting on its feet, employing American labor, and offering an opportunity for the investment of American capital; but while the Committee on Ways and Means have taken off the duty on raw material and thereby aided the manufacturer to the extent of 8 cents a yard, they have also taken off the tariff on the manufactured article to the extent of 28 or 30 cents a yard, thereby discriminating against the American manufacturer. And this discrimination against this American industry to the extent of 20 cents a yard will probably destroy it.

With these remarks I ask to submit a statement on the part of those engaged in this manufacturing interest.

The statement is as follows:

A FEW FACTS.

First. Mohair during the last four years has declined about 6 per cent.; that is, from 48 cents per pound in 1884 to 45 cents in 1888.

Second. Plushes of French and German manufacture are imported at 30 to 40 per cent. discount from prices ruling four years ago, when American plushes of same grades were first put on the market.

Third. Free raw material will reduce the cost of cloth about 8 cents per yard.

Fourth. The removal of specific duty, as proposed in House bill No. 9051, will reduce the cost of imported plushes 28 to 30 cents per yard.

Fifth. The proposed bill will therefore discriminate against the American manufacturer 29 to 22 cents per yard, and enable the importer to sell the goods at about cost to manufacture the goods in this country with free mohair.

The undersigned manufacturers of mohair plushes beg leave to submit the above facts for your consideration.

SANDFORD MILLS.
JOHN HOPENWELL, JR.,
Treasurer.

WASHINGTON, July 10, 1888.

We ask this on the following grounds: Under the bill as at present framed with free mohair, it will make a difference in the cost of plushes we manufacture of 8 to 8½ cents per yard. And with the specific pound duty left off on the manufactured goods, as provided in the bill, it will reduce the cost of foreign goods of the same class to importers from 28 to 30 cents per yard, or a net difference against us of 20 cents per yard; which difference is greater than the net profit to the domestic manufacturer to-day in competition with foreign goods. To make the duty equal to what it is to-day, which is very close work for us, it would have to be 70 per cent. ad valorem, and 60 per cent. is the lowest that we can see our way clear to work under.

We have been seven years perfecting our machinery for the manufacture of this goods, and the first five years were at a loss, so that it is only for two years that we have been able to see any profit in the production of these goods.

As the item of labor is not less than 40 per cent. of the cost, we can see no possibility of any profit in going on and manufacturing these goods should the bill pass in its present form, and we can not believe that it is the wish of the framers of this bill to kill a new industry of this kind, which, with reasonable protection, would steadily grow. Neither can we help feeling that the removal of the specific or weight duty is a very serious blow to our industry, as that was a duty that could not be avoided by undervaluation; and we have the best of evidence of considerable of this undervaluation being carried on.

We can furnish letters from importers of these goods stating that the price has declined from 30 to 40 per cent. during the four years the goods have been made in this country, while the price of mohair, from which they are manufactured, has declined only about 6 per cent., as per the following schedule copied from a letter from a party through whom we import stock.

During the past four years the prices have ranged as follows:

	Per pound.
1886	.46
1887–'88	.45

That the manufacture of these goods in this country has greatly reduced the cost to the American consumers is conceded by all familiar with this subject.

Yours, truly,

JOHN HOPEWELL, JR.

SANFORD MILLS.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 61 strike out "30 per cent. ad valorem" and insert "20 cents per pound and 20 per cent. ad valorem."

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That on and after the 1st day of July, 1888, in lieu of the duties heretofore imposed on the articles hereinafter mentioned, there shall be levied, collected, and paid the following rates of duty on said articles severally:

Paper, sized or glued, suitable only for printing paper, 15 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. WHITING, of Massachusetts. I move to strike out lines 6 and 7.

The Committee of Ways and Means has touched the interests of the manufacturers of paper lightly, but why it should touch them at all I do not understand.

If an article is sold in the United States as low, or about as low as in any country, and of as good quality as can be made in any country, that ought to be a satisfactory condition to every one. My observation and inquiry lead me to the conclusion that the price of all grades of paper is on an average about the same as it is abroad, and the quality is not inferior to that made elsewhere. Before 1860, and for a few years subsequent to that time, there were large quantities of paper imported, but the manufacture of American paper has driven the foreign article out of the market. (There is hardly a person who does not admit that the American product is equal or superior to any, and this is true to such an extent that there is no demand in public or private for the foreign article, with a few exceptions.) Whatever is now imported consists largely of specialties, such as photograph paper, which as yet has not been made to any great extent by our manufacturers.

I recur to the question, "Why should the committee reduce the tariff on paper?" On book paper, such as is used in the publication of magazines and books, the duty is reduced by the Mills bill from 20 to 15 per cent., and on news paper from 15 to 12 per cent. You will observe, Mr. Chairman, that this is a reduction of the duty in each case of 25 per cent. If the price of paper was high in this country, if the quality was inferior so that there was a business demand for foreign paper, there might then be some justification for the proposed change, but, as I have already said, the quality is as good as can be found anywhere, and the price is as low. For the information of the House I will state the changes that have taken place in the price of paper since 1860.

At that time the ordinary grades of writing paper sold from 16 to 25 cents per pound, and now the same paper sells from 9½ to 16 cents, a decline of from 7½ to 9 cents, or 40 to 47 per cent. Book-paper sold in 1860 for 11 to 13 cents per pound, and now sells for 6½ to 7 cents, a decline of from 5 to 6 cents, or nearly 50 per cent. And news paper which sold from 8 to 10 cents per pound is now selling for 4 cents, or a decline of over 50 per cent.

You will observe that the price of paper has been reduced in twenty-eight years nearly 50 per cent., and it is also true that during that time the quality has improved, and that wages have advanced 40 per cent. To illustrate this point of the increase in wages, the skilled workman, who in 1860 received from $1.50 to $1.75 per day, now receives from $2.75 to $3.50 per day, an increase of more than 60 per cent. The same class of help in Great Britain receives from $1.25 to $1.75 per day, or not more than one-half the rate of wages here. The average increase of wages in the paper industry in the United States, including all kinds of labor, is 40 per cent., and more than balances any advantage the manufacturer may have received from the use of wood-pulp, or cheaper material of any kind.

This ought to be a satisfactory condition to the consumer of paper and to the laborer who makes it, and I repeat that I am at a loss to understand why, in the absence of any complaint on the part of the consumer, laborer, or manufacturer, there should be any proposition to change the tariff rate. It will be said in reply, If these things are so, why do you want a tariff on paper at all? My answer is that we want the tariff to prevent the European manufacturer from sending his surplus production here, thus breaking down our market, closing our mills and throwing our labor out of employment. We welcome home competition, but we do not want to compete with the whole world, and especially with that labor which does not receive one-half the compensation of American labor.

The advocates of the policy of protection to American manufactures claim that the consumer obtains the product at a reasonable price through competition among our own people, and the facts I have narrated furnish the most conclusive proof that the paper industry is a marvelous instance of the good result and practical effect of such a policy and of the correctness of the position taken by those who favor protection. When it is now proposed to reduce the duty on paper we confront you with a condition, not a theory—the condition being high wages, low cost to the consumer, constant improvement in quality, and no general demand for any change in the tariff. [Applause.]

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 29, section 4, after line 7, insert:

"Photographic print paper, 25 per cent. ad valorem."

"Photographic print paper which has undergone albumenizing or sensitizing shall be charged with a customs duty of 35 per cent. ad valorem: Provided, That nothing shall be deemed photographic print paper under either of the provisions of this act unless it has the name of the manufacturer stamped in watermark thereon."

Mr. BAKER, of New York. On the 20th day of June it was my privilege to offer an amendment to the free-list, proposing to put thereon photographic print paper, not albumnized or sensitized, but in the wisdom of the House, after the statement of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] that he could see no force in the argument I offered, for he knew nothing about the matter, and therefore that it was better to leave it where it was, the House expressed a determination to maintain a duty upon it.

I submitted at that time some observations why there should be some protection afforded to the albuminizers and sensitizers of paper in this country, amongst others, suggesting that the paper was imported from Germany subject to duty only of 15 per cent. ad valorem, while the plain paper is subject, under a decision of the Treasury Department upon a ruling of an inferior court in New York, to a duty of 25 per cent. I desire to submit to the wisdom of the House the proposition that some regard should be had for the interests of the American dustry engaged in this particular branch of business; and that the plain paper should not be discriminated against in favor of the albumenized or sensitized articles. I read an article from a responsible establishment in my city giving the reasons why that should be done, and it appears in the remarks offered by me on the 29th of June, as before stated.

Now, the proposition is—and I submit to the good judgment and fairness of the gentlemen representing the majority that it is only reasonable and fair—the proposition is that there should be a distinction between the plain paper, which is raw material, and the manufactured article, which comes in in the form of albumenized and sensitized paper specially used in the manufacture of photographs. The proposition must commend itself to every one of my Democratic friends, I am sure, if they will consider it. They have refused to put the plain paper upon the free-list, perhaps wisely; and I think I am warranted in asking them now to put a reasonable duty on this, so that the interest of my friend here who preceded me may be reasonably protected by putting a duty on the manufactured article, so that the manufacturer in my city who is forced to come in competition with the manufacturers of France and Germany may have some opportunity of continuing his business. Is there anything unreasonable in that? I think not. But our friends on the other side will not listen to reason, so that we have almost despaired of having any amendments adopted by their consent.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 63, noes 75.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Printing-paper, unsized, used for books and newspapers exclusively, 12 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. DINGLEY. I move to strike out lines 8 and 9.

Mr. Chairman, I will add only a single word to that which has been so well said by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WHITING]. When the Committee on Ways and Means framed this bill and reduced the duty on printing-paper used for newspapers from 15 to 12 per cent., they had placed the wood-pulp, which is a large constituent in the manufacture of paper, upon the free-list. Subsequently they changed the bill in that respect and retained the old duty of 10 per cent. upon the raw material of printing-paper, which certainly ought to lead the committee to change the figure of 12 per cent. back to the old rate of duty of 15 per cent.

I desire to speak more particularly. I am a purchaser of printing-paper, now used for newspapers; and if it could benefit any one, certainly I ought to come in for a portion of it at least. But I wish to bear testimony to the fact that a duty of 15 per cent. upon printing-paper, which has encouraged the manufacture of paper in this country to so large an extent, has been of prime and important benefit to every purchaser of white printing paper.

Before the war I paid 9 cents a pound for ordinary printing-paper. That is the lowest price it had ever reached at that time. To-day I am purchasing the same quality of paper at 4½ cents per pound, and I am satisfied from a thorough examination of the matter that it is our protective duty which has encouraged the manufacture of printing-paper in this country, and stimulated invention, at the same time paying to the operatives 40 per cent. more on an average than is paid abroad. If the reduction of this duty should result in the bringing in of large quantities of paper, the surplus of foreign manufacture, and that should injure our manufacturing interests in this country, I am satisfied, as a purchaser of printing-paper, it would result to our disadvantage, and that the price would be increased upon us as soon as our own industry should be thus injuriously affected and diminished. It seems to me, in view of this fact, that the low prices at which we purchase, the fact that 40 per cent. more is paid for wages, and the fact that the Committee on Ways and Means have restored the 10 per cent. duty upon the raw material of which printing-paper is made, ought to lead at the same time to the restoration of the small duty of 15 per cent. provided by existing law. I hope, therefore, the Committee of the House, with the approval of the Committee on Ways and Means, will see in these reasons an abundant cause for striking out these two lines and allowing the duty to remain as it is now, as has been done in the case of the raw material, wood-pulp.

The question was taken on the amendment, and the Chair stated that the "noes" seemed to have it.

Mr. DINGLEY. I call for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 53, noes 80.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Bonnets, hats, and hoods for men, women, and children, composed of hair, whalebone, or any vegetable material, and not specially enumerated or provided for, 30 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I ask unanimous consent that the paragraph beginning at line 23 and ending at line 26 be passed over until to-morrow.

Mr. MILLS. I agree to that.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Brooms of all kinds, 20 per cent. ad valorem.
Brushes of all kinds, 20 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. LONG. I move to strike out line 28, and in that connection ask to have printed in the RECORD the following petition:

To the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States:

Your petitioners respectfullly represent that they are engaged in the business of manufacturing brushes, and that in view of the proposed reduction of the import duties on brushes of foreign manufacture they earnestly and respectfully protest against such further reduction of duty for the following reasons:

That the brush-manufacturing business since the establishment of the tariff has largely increased, furnishing employment to many thousands, and has been attended by a large reduction in the price of goods, and also a marked improvement in their quality.

That the last reduction of duty some five years ago, from 40 per cent. to 30 per cent. had a disastrous effect upon our business, driving a number of manufacturers out of it, and causing the abandonment of one branch of manufacturing in which they were engaged, to wit, the manufacture of tooth-brushes.

That a still farther reduction of the duty from 30 per cent. to 20 per cent. will have a ruinous effect upon the industry, without doubt necessitating the closing of many factories, and thereby causing great hardship to the workmen and heavy losses to their employers, who have their capital invested in expensive machinery, worthless for other purposes.

That the last reduction of the duty on brushes was immediately followed by heavy importations of foreign-made goods, and it is certain that another reduction of the duties will cause a much larger importation than before, as the American manufacturer will then be still less capable of successfully competing with the foreign product.

That such increased importation will cause an increase of revenue to the Government, which your petitioners believe is not the object designed or desired by your honorable body.

That the placing of bristles on the free-list, thereby cutting off the present duty of 15 cents per pound, would be only a slight compensation to the brush manufacturer, supposing that the price of foreign bristles was not advanced.

That such a reduction would not effect a saving to your petitioners of more than 1 per cent. on the manufactured product, while the proposed reduction of one-third of the duty would enable the importer to land French or German brushes at a saving of at least 8 per cent., which at the present low prices prevailing would represent to your petitioners the difference between success or failure.

And your petitioners will ever pray,

THE TARIFF.

The Committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

Card clothing, 15 cents per square foot; when manufactured from tempered steel wire, 25 cents per square foot.

Mr. MILLS. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 30, line 31, strike out "fifteen" and insert "twenty," and in line 32, strike out "twenty-five" and insert "forty;" making the paragraph read:

"Card clothing, 20 cents per square foot; when manufactured from tempered steel wire, 25 cents per square foot."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Gloves, of all descriptions, wholly or partially manufactured, 40 per cent. ad volorem: Provided, That gloves made of silk taffeta shall be taxed 50 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. WEST. I move to strike out that paragraph.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

India-rubber fabrics, and articles composed wholly or in part of India rubber, and India rubber boots and shoes, 15 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. MILLS. I move to strike out that paragraph, including lines 70, 71, and 72.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Japanned ware of all kinds not specially enumerated or provided for, 30 per per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. MILLS. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

After line 76, insert "kaolin, crude, $1 per ton; china clay, or wrought kaolin, $2 per ton."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MILLS. I offer another amendment which I send to the desk to come in directly after the one just adopted.

The amendment was read, as follows:

After the amendment just adopted insert "marble of all kinds, in block, rough, or squared, 40 cents per cubic foot."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Pipes, pipe-bowls, and all smokers' articles whatsoever, not specially enumerated or provided for, 50 per cent. ad valorem; all common pipes of clay, 25 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. YOST. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 87, page 32, strike out the word "fifty" and insert "seventy," and in lines 88 and 89 strike out the words "twenty-five per cent. ad valorem" and insert "25 cents per gross;" so that it shall read:

"Pipes, pipe-bowls, and all smoker's articles whatsoever, not specially enumerated or provided for, seventy per cent. ad valorem; all common pipes of clay, 25 cents per gross."

Mr. YOST. Mr. Chairman, there were less than $17,000 of duty collected on clay pipes last year, less than $48,000 worth of the articles having been imported. But that $48,000 represented nearly the whole trade in clay pipes, and meant the taking of that much money from the pockets of the working people of this country. More that 95 per cent. of the cost of clay pipes is paid for labor, and doubtless for this reason the importations are estimated at 98 per cent. of the whole consumption, leaving but 2 per cent. to be supplied by the domestic manufacturer.

In my district is a pipe factory capable of turning out 30,000 pipes per day. It is operated, however, but one-third or one-half of the time, for the simple reason that its employés are paid double the wages of those in the same line across the waters, and that means a double cost to the manufacturer, for, as I said, nothing but the question of labor is involved, the clay being right at the door of the factory. With a duty of even 25 cents per gross this whole market for their labor would be transferred to the American workmen, whilst the consumer would be in no wise injuriously affected thereby.

The cost of the article to the consumer is now at the lowest price within the medium of our currency, namely, one cent per piece for those in most general use.

The only possible tendency, therefore, of the committee's provision would be to exterminate the trade in this country altogether, whilst if the amendment I propose is adopted it would materially help our people, and hurt no one whose interests are identical with ours.

The amendment was rejected—ayes 52, noes 67.

The Clerk read as follows:

Watches, watch-cases, watch-movements, parts of watches, watch-glasses, and watch-keys, whether separately packed or otherwise, and watch materials not specially enumerated or provided for in this act, 25 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. I move to strike out all after the word "watches," in line 97, down to and including the words "packed or otherwise," in line 98.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Will the gentleman state why he offers that amendment?

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. This paragraph changes the existing law, and the object of the amendment is to restore the existing law.

Mr. BUCHANAN. This is the existing law.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. I beg the gentleman's pardon, but he is mistaken.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Then the book which has been furnished us from the Committee on Ways and Means is incorrect.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. It does not pretend to be correct.

Mr. BUCHANAN. It is a question between the book and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS], and I do not know which is correct. The presumption, however, is in favor of the gentleman, judging from other parts of the book.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. I have the existing law before me.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That the following amendments to and provisions for existing laws shall take effect on and after the passage and approval of this act.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

After line 3, page 33, insert:

"Section 6 of the act of March 3, 1883, Schedule G, is hereby amended by adding to the paragraphs fixing the duty on oranges and lemons the following: Provided, That when boxes in which oranges or lemons are imported shall be of material manufactured in the United States, and so verified in accordance with regulations established by the Secretary of the Treasury, there shall be a reduction of the duties provided by this act of 5 cents for each box and 3 cents for each half box containing the same."

Mr. MILLS. I make the point of order that we have passed the part of this bill which deals with rates, and that the amendments now in order are amendments in relation to the administrative features of the bill.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I consulted carefully with members of the Committee on Ways and Means in regard to the proper time to offer this amendment.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Is this the amendment about which the gentleman spoke?

Mr. BOUTELLE. This is the amendment to which I called the attention of members of the Ways and Means Committee, and it seems to me that this is the proper place to offer it.

The CHAIRMAN. It would be in order before section 5, which has just been read.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Then I ask that we go back, in order to allow this amendment to come in.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. If this is the amendment the gentleman spoke to me about, I was under the impression that the proper place for it would be on page 39.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I think that is the place the gentleman from Kentucky suggested; but that is still further on. My impression was upon a more careful re-examination of the bill that it would come in more appropriately with the amendments now being considered, for the reason that this amendment of mine directly applies to a particular portion of the existing tariff law. In other words, it should be placed in direct connection with the paragraphs of the present law fixing the duty on oranges and lemons, because there the size of the boxes is specified. This amendment fixes the rate of rebate on boxes and half-boxes of oranges or lemons; and the existing law indicates the size of those boxes, so that this should properly be connected with that subject. I think this is the proper place for it to be considered.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I am not prepared to say that the gentleman is not correct. When he submitted the question to me, I was under the impression that the best place for it to come in was at the end of section 6.

Mr. MILLS. I withdraw the point of order, and the gentleman can offer his amendment.

Mr. BOUTELLE. This amendment is simply a provision of law which in substance was in force under the act of February 8, 1875, up to the time when the act of 1883 was passed. It was part of the clause which provided a rebate or a remission of the duties upon barrels, boxes, crates, and shooks manufactured in the United States exported to a foreign country and reimported filled with foreign products. In the tariff act of 1875, as continuing in force up to 1883, regulations were established by the Treasury Department which provided for the free importation of these American-manufactured boxes containing foreign fruit with a rebate amounting to about 5 cents a box. When the Tariff Commission reported in 1883 they unanimously favored the retention of this feature. The bill reported from the Ways and Means Committee of the House in the Forty-seventh Congress also contained a provision similar to that which I have now offered. Gentlemen will recollect that the House tariff act of 1883 was not adopted, but a Senate substitute was passed; and in some way in the hurry and confusion of the substitution this item was omitted, unintentionally, as no objection was made to it in any quarter.

This industry, the manufacture of box-shooks from the hard woods that were previously little used except for fuel, is one of considerable importance in my section of the country and in some other parts of the United States. Within a few years, since the Austrians have adopted the labor-saving machinery in use in this country, the competition has become so close with the underpaid labor of that country that the exportation of these boxes has almost entirely ceased and a large number of people have been thrown out of employment. We had already built up an industry which took from our forests woods which were otherwise of very little account, manufactured them into these boxes, and sold from our section something like $2,000,000 worth of them, forming a very important and useful industry. The people in my district have the machinery on hand and are all ready to continue the manufacture of these shooks. Messrs. Hathorn, Foss & Co., who carry on the business in my district, write me:

We have been for the past few years paying probably an average of two hundred men per day in our business the year through, and the time is approaching, and very soon, when we must abandon the enterprise unless we are protected from the direct competition of Austria, where labor receives less equivalent than in any other civilized country.

The exporting agent of the manufacturers writes me that he has paid as high as $5,000 for freight on these boxes in a single month, and that he has collected more than $1,750,000 for the shooks thus exported from this country, all of which came from the foreign purchaser and was distributed among the manufacturers, workmen, and farmers of my section. He says:

Under the law of 1875 the rebate on our American boxes exported in shooks and returned filled with fruit was about 5 cents a box, which gave our box a value in Sicily above the foreign-made box and enabled our manufacturers to compete with the pauper labor of Italy and Austria.

Now, as the tariff is under consideration, and as our Democratic friends wish to reduce the revenue and increase exports as a basis for more permanent employment for our laborers, we hope you will join them to the extent of our request for amendment.

The cost of this product is very largely for labor and transportation, and we can not compete with Italian and Austrian labor and pay American wages.

I would state, Mr. Chairman, that this remission of duty will not stimulate competition with California or Florida oranges, as the boxes are used for Mediterranean fruit that comes here at a season when it does not interfere with the domestic product, as would be the case with Jamaica or Porto Rico oranges that are imported in barrels.

Now, what is proposed by this amendment is not an increase of the revenue, but a decrease. It provides simply that when a cargo of oranges shall come from Sicily or Messina or other ports, bearing with it the verification of the American consul that those oranges are in boxes manufactured in the United States—and I will say that all the regulations have been carefully made by the Department, under the old law, and carried out for years to prevent any difficulties in this regard—thereupon there shall be a remission of duty to the extent of 5 cents for each full box and 3 cents for each half box, giving to that extent an advantage to the manufacturer of the American boxes and thereby inciting the foreign fruit-grower to use the American shooks instead of the foreign shooks, thus giving to labor on this side of the ocean the advantage of carrying on that industry. I say this was the law from 1875 to 1883. It was intended to be reincorporated in the law of 1883; was reported favorably by the Tariff Commission and by the Ways and Means Committee of this House, but was omitted by inadvertence.

As no tariff bill was passed in either House during the previous two Congresses, since the passage of the act of 1883, it has been impossible until now to remedy the omission. I do not think there can be any valid objection by anybody to the amendment, and I therefore hope it will be unanimously agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN declared the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BOUTELLE demanded a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 54, noes 72.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. MILLS. As this part of the bill was unanimously agreed to by the Committee on Ways and Means I do not think there will be any objection to it, and I hope the Clerk will read right on.

The Clerk read as follows:

Section 6 of the act of March 3, 1883, entitled "An act to reduce internal-revenue taxation, and for other purposes," providing a substitute for Title XXXIII of the Revised Statutes of the United States, is hereby amended as to certain of the sections and parts of sections or schedules in such substituted title so that they shall be as follows, respectively:

"SEC. 2499. Each and every imported article not enumerated or provided for in any schedule in this title, which is similar, either in material, quality, texture, or the use to which it may be applied, to any article enumerated in this title as chargeable with duty, shall pay the same rate of duty which is levied on the enumerated article which it most resembles in any of the particulars before mentioned; and if any non-enumerated articles equally resembles two or more enumerated articles on which different rates of duty are chargeable, there shall be levied on such non-enumerated article the same rate of duty as is chargeable on the article which it resembles paying the highest rate of duty; and on articles, not otherwise provided for, manufactured from two or more materials, the duty shall be assessed at the rate at which the dutiable component material of chief value may be chargeable; and the words 'component material of chief value,' whenever used in this title, shall be held to mean that dutiable component material which shall exceed in value any other single component material found in the article; and the value of each component material shall be determined by the ascertained value of such material in its last form and condition before it became a component material of such article. If two or more rates of duty shall be applicable to any imported article, it shall pay duty at the highest of such rates: Provided, That any non-enumerated article similar in material and quality and texture and the use to which it may be applied to any article on the free-list, and in the manufacture of which no dutiable materials are used, shall be free of duty."

Mr. DINGLEY. I move the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting after line 38:

"SEC. 2510. All lumber, timber, hemp, manila, wire rope, and iron and steel rods, bars, spikes, nails, plates, angles, bars and bolts, and copper and composition metal which may be necessary for the construction and equipment of vessels built in the United States for foreign account and ownership, or for the purpose of being employed in the foreign trade, including the trade between the Atlantic and Pacific ports of the United States, after the passage of this act, may be imported in bond under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe; and upon proof that such materials have been used for such purpose no duties shall be paid thereon. But vessels receiving the benefit of this section shall not be allowed to engage in the coastwise trade of the United States more than two months in any one year, except upon the payment to the United States of the duties on which a rebate is herein allowed: Provided, That vessels built in the United States for foreign account shall not be allowed to engage in the coastwise trade of the United States."

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, the amendment which I have offered simply extends and enlarges the principle adopted by Congress in the act of June 6, 1872, and the tariff act of 1883, so as to add "plates, angles, and bars" to the list of articles therein named. The act of 1872 provided that—

All lumber, timber, hemp, manilla, and iron and steel rods, bars, spikes, nails, and bolts, and copper and composition metal which may be necessary for the construction and equipment of vessels built in the United States for the purpose of being employed in the foreign trade, including the trade between the Atlantic and Pacific ports of the United States, * * * may be imported in bond under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe; and upon proof that such materials have been used for such purpose no duties shall be paid thereon, etc. (Section 2513, Revised Statutes.)

And also that—

All articles of foreign production needed for the repair of American vessels engaged exclusively in foreign trade may be withdrawn from bonded warehouses free of duty, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe. (Section 2514 Revised Statutes.)

The tariff act of March 3, 1883, re-enacted these provisions and enlarged the list of materials by adding "wire rope," and extended the provision to vessels built for foreign account and ownership. It appears in the revision as section 2510. The shipping act of 1884 adds "supplies."

The object of the act of 1872 was to give the builder and owner of American vessels employed or to be employed in the foreign carrying trade whatever benefit might be derived from the privilege of importing free of duty materials for the construction, equipment, and repairs of such vessels. It did in fact cover all such materials for the wooden vessels, which at that time comprised almost the entire American fleet employed in the foreign trade.

The object of my amendment is to extend the same principle to the materials of iron vessels for the foreign trade. An examination of the state of facts which led the Forty-second and Forty-seventh Congresses to grant this apparently exceptional privilege to the builder and owner of an American vessel employed or to be employed in the foreign trade will show that it was just and proper in the circumstances in which our vessels in the foreign trade had been placed.

Since the principle of maritime reciprocity was adopted by Great Britain and the United States in 1850 the water carriage of the exports and imports of the United States has been open to the vessels of Great Britain and of most other foreign nations on the same terms as our own vessels. Unlike the builder of vessels for our coastwise trade, which is restricted to American vessels, and unlike every other domestic industry, which is given a home market from which foreign competition is barred to a certain extent by duties, the builder of American vessels for the foreign trade is obliged to manufacture for use in a market opened by our reciprocal maritime treaties to the vessels of other maritime nations on the same terms as to American vessels.

Inasmuch as the nation adopted in 1850 the policy of opening to foreign nations one business—to wit, the water carriage of our exports and imports—it is but just that it should give the builders and owners of vessels employed or to be employed in this unprotected business the privilege of obtaining their materials for construction, equipment, and supplies wherever it may be found most advantageous without the payment of duties.

This is not unjust to the home manufacturer of any of these materials, for he has a home market for his products for the multitude of ordinary uses, barred against foreign competition to the extent of the duty; and if he is not able to sell his products as cheap as they can be imported to the one industry which builds vessels that must enter into unrestricted competition with foreigners, then it is essential that in order to exist at all this industry must have free access to the markets of the world for materials; and the encouragement thus given to build up ship-yards for this trade will open a wider use of home products for this industry than would have otherwise been found. For it is certain that in any event more or less home materials will be used in connection with imported materials.

The principle of allowing practically free materials for the manufacture of articles that are to be used in a market which is open to unrestricted foreign competition, was adopted in 1799 by the founders of our Government, and from that time to the present has been retained as a wise feature of our revenue system under every tariff that has existed from that day to this. The principle is embodied in section 3019 of the Revised Statutes, which is as follows:

There shall be allowed on all articles wholly manufactured of materials imported on which duties have been paid when exported a drawback, equal in amount to the duty paid on such materials and no more, to be ascertained under such regulations as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury. Ten per cent. on the amount of all drawbacks so allowed shall, however, be retained for the use of the United States by the collectors paying such drawbacks respectively.

This law, which has stood on our statute-books for eighty-five years, allows a drawback of 90 per cent of the duties on all imported materials for the manufacture in this country of a vessel or any other article wholly made of such imported material, for use by a foreigner in a foreign or an open market, and in case of many articles the drawback has been increased to 99 per cent. The act of June 6, 1872, authorizes the payment of such drawback as to imported materials in the case of a large number of articles manufactured partly of home materials, and a later act extends the same principle to canned goods; and there is no reason why the same principle should not be extended to all articles. Thus we see that a manufacturer may import materials, whether raw or manufactured, for making iron, woolen, wood, or other goods or articles for the foreign trade, and when these articles are exported will be entitled to receive back from 90 to 99 per cent. of the duties paid on the imported materials.

A ship-builder may import in the same manner materials for building a vessel for a foreigner to use in carrying American exports and imports; and will any one contend that the same American ship-builder should not have the same privilege when he is building a vessel for an American owner to sail in open competition with the vessel built for such foreigner?

I take it for granted that all regard it desirable, if not essential, to adopt such a policy as looks, ultimately at least, to the building of American vessels for the foreign trade in American ship-yards. This is essential for this reason, if for no other, that no nation can be regarded as reasonably protected from foreign invasion which has not within its own territory numerous well-established ship-yards and trained shipwrights and workmen that may be used by the Government at a day's notice to construct war vessels, floating batteries, and transports in the exigency of war. This necessity, if nothing more, requires that our policy should be directed to the construction of vessels at home.

There is a difference of opinion among ship-builders as to whether the extension of the act of 1872 so as to allow materials for iron vessels for the foreign trade to be imported free of duty, as materials for wooden vessels have been for sixteen years, would give material aid to the successful construction of iron vessels, particularly steam-ships, in competition with the Clyde. All concede that it would often prove of some advantage. Some think that it would be a small benefit; others that it would afford encouragement for the establishment of new ship-yards, and after a lapse of sufficient time to obtain the requisite experience and development, would successfully solve the problem of building vessels, provided the other problem of profitably sailing them is also satisfactorily solved.

But whether of small or great advantage, and whatever else may be required to solve the problem of the successful construction of iron steam-ships for the foreign trade at substantially as low cost as on the Clyde, simple justice requires that whether our duties are high or low they should be entirely remitted on imported materials for the construction, equipment, repairs, and supplies of vessels employed or to be employed in the foreign carrying trade, which we have opened to foreign vessels on equal terms with our own.

It is for these reasons, Mr. Chairman, that I have offered this amendment, hoping that gentlemen on the other side who represent the majority will consent that this step forward may be taken in the important matter of encouraging iron-ship building for the foreign trade, divested of the proposition to also allow the free importation and registry of foreign-built vessels with which the majority have insisted in connecting it; for I trust they will see, as I do, that free ships connected with free materials destroy the value of the latter and make it impossible for us to build iron ships in this country for the foreign trade.

The following communication, addressed to me by the Bath (Me.) Board of Trade, representing the largest wooden-ship building center in this country, shows their views on this question:

BATH BOARD OF TRADE,
Bath, Me., July 14, 1888.

DEAR SIR: As a friend of the shipping interest and shipmen of New England we would like to call your attention for a few moments to that section of the tariff relating to the importation of iron.

Revised Statute No. 2513 allows the importation of all foreign material (duty free) that are used in the construction of wooden ships for the foreign trade, such as bolts, bars, bar-iron, copper composition, and, in fact, all the materials that are used, so that when we built the ship we could construct her lower than any other nation; but there is no longer any demand for the wooden ship; the world needs iron vessels, and we have either got to construct them or give up our carrying trade to other nations. In regulating the duties on iron in the new bill if Congress would allow it to be imported to be used in the construction of iron ships in the foreign trade (free of duty), subject to restrictions of the Treasury Department, similar to Revised Statute No. 2513, this would enable us to build the iron ships and would again revive our ship-yards and our flag on the ocean.

As there is a large surplus in the Treasury, the duty on this material is not needed, and if this clause could be entered in the bill employment could at once be given to thousands of skilled workmen now idle and seeking work for the support of their families.

In this section of New England, Mr. DINGLEY, as you are well aware, the decay of ship-building is felt to a greater extent than in any other, and as the mileage-subsidy plan seems to be objectionable to the shipping committee if this one could be substituted it would assist very materially in reviving this great industry.

Hoping this proposition may meet your approval, we are, sir, very respectfully, yours,

A. J. FULLER, President.
P. M. WHITMORE, Vice-President.
F. W. WEEKS, Secretary.

Hon. NELSON DINGLEY, Jr.,
Washington, D. C.

Mr. MILLS. I think we had better wait until the whole question comes up.

Mr. DINGLEY. This will be the only opportunity offered this session, and I trust the gentleman from Texas will not defeat a proposition which has been before the Committee on Ways and Means, on my motion, for four years, and for which no time has been found by the majority to present it to the House.

Mr. DINGLEY's amendment was rejected.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I offer the amendment I send to the desk, to come in after line 38, on page 35.

The Clerk read as follows:

That ad valorem duties imposed by the laws of the United States on goods, wares, and merchandise imported from foreign countries shall be assessed upon the actual retail price or value at which such goods are sold for home consumption in the country of production or export, whenever in the country of such production or export ad valorem duties upon goods, wares, and merchandise imported into such country from the United States are assessed upon the retail price or value at which such goods are sold for home consumption in the United States.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. The purpose of this amendment is to meet a difficulty under which many of our people along the Canadian border have suffered during years past by the present law. I suppose it prevails to a considerable extent in all of our importations and exportations of goods, wares, and merchandise. The difficulty I can illustrate in this way: A manufacturer ships his products, for instance, to Canada by the car-load, and their freights, as I have occasion to know, are assessed at the retail valuation of the property where it is manufactured, while, on the contrary, that manufactured in Canada and shipped to this country has a duty imposed upon it according to the wholesale valuation in the country of production. You will see at once the injustice this condition of things imposes upon our people; their products coming here, availing themselves of our generous policy in our revenue laws, have duties levied upon them at their wholesale valuation, while shipments on our part into those countries are forced to pay duties at the retail price at which such commodities are selling in this country. This is unjust to us, and our people have labored and suffered under it for years. The purpose of the amendment is to change this order of things and to make our revenue laws conform in this respect to any discrimination that may be made against our people in foreign countries.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

Page 35, line 38, after "duty," insert:

"And provided further, That no goods, wares, and merchandise the product in whole or in any material part of the labor of persons confined in any prison, jail, penitentiary, reformatory, or other penal institution, shall be imported for the purposes of sale or trade."

Mr. MILLS. I make the point of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. What point of order does the gentleman make?

Mr. MILLS. That it is not pertinent to this portion of the bill; and besides that it is the substance of an amendment which has been already submitted and voted down. It does not belong to this part of the bill.

Mr. BUCHANAN. A word upon the point of order.

This amendment has not been offered before. I did offer an amendment at the end of the free-list, when that part of the bill had been completed, providing that any goods thereby specified, when produced by convict labor abroad, should not be admitted free of duty. At the beginning of the dutiable schedule I also offered an amendment referring to the duties on the articles named in that schedule.

This amendment, however, goes much farther; and it provides that hereafter no goods or commodities shall be imported, not simply the goods named in the schedule, but any goods, whether named in these schedules or coming in under the old law, and that all shall be affected by this provision. It is not, then, the amendment voted upon before, and it is perfectly germane to this section.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas desire to be heard upon the point of order?

Mr. MILLS. Only to say that the point of order is made that this provision does not belong to the portion of the bill which we are now discussing. It should have been offered to that portion of the bill fixing the rates of duty.

Mr. BUCHANAN. But this does not undertake to fix the rate of duty. It is an absolute prohibition of the importation of certain classes of goods. The clause to which it is offered is a clause which makes general regulations in reference to importations. It is a regulation providing that certain kinds of goods shall not come in, and therefore these regulations are amended to that extent.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is inclined to think that the point of order is good; but, if there is no objection, it will be submitted to the committee.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I ask for a ruling, because I am confident the amendment is germane to the section.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Why not take a vote upon it any way?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Let me put a query. While we are fixing rates, we are not prohibiting. If I had offered that to the section fixing the rates, it would not have been in consonance with the paragraph, because you say such goods when imported shall pay such and such duties, presupposing importation. On the contrary, my amendment in reference to a certain line of goods declares there shall be no importation; so it could not have been germane to that part of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is in doubt upon the question, and, in order to be perfectly fair, will submit the amendment to the committee.

The question was taken; and the Chairman declared that the "noes" appeared to prevail.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I demand a division. This is the Canadian law, and I want to see what this House will do with it.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 41, noes 55.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, however, That the limitation in value above specified shall not apply to wearing-apparel and other personal effects which may have been taken from the United States to foreign countries by the persons returning therefrom; and such last-named articles shall, upon production of evidence satisfactory to the collector and to the naval officer (if any) that they have been previously exported from the United States by such persons, and have not been advanced in value or improved in condition by any process of manufacture or labor thereon since so exported, be exempt from the payment of duty.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I offer the following amendment:

Page 36, line 83, strike out "and to the naval officer, if any" and insert "or officer acting as such."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That if there be used for covering or holding imported merchandise, whether dutiable or free, any material or article, other than the ordinary, usual, and necessary coverings used for covering or holding such merchandise, duty shall be levied and collected thereon at the rate to which such material or article would be subject if imported separately.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I offer the following amendment.

Insert at the end of line 23, on page 39, the following:

"Provided further, That so much of the foregoing as relates to boxes, sacks, or coverings shall not apply to boxes, sacks, or such other covering as may be the usual and necessary boxing or covering for machinery or parts thereof."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 11. That authority is hereby given to the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, to dispense whenever expedient with the triplicate invoices and consular certificates now required by sections 2853, 2854, and 2855 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; and triplicate invoices and consular certificates shall in no case be required when the value of the merchandise shipped by any one consignor in any one vessel at one and the same time does not exceed $100; and the Secretary of the Treasury, with the concurrence of the Secretary of State, is hereby authorized to make such general regulations in regard to invoices and consular certificates as in his judgment the public interest may require.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I move to strike out the last paragraph, and do it for the purpose of inquiring of the committee why in the former part of this section they give the Secretary of the Treasury discretion to dispense whenever expedient with triplicate invoices. I can readily understand why they might not be required in the case of small importations; but, as I understand it, in the first part of the section absolute discretion is given to the Secretary of the Treasury to dispense with triplicate invoices in all cases. I would like to know the reason for that. Triplicate invoices, as they now stand, are a safeguard against fraud.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Gentlemen will observe that this provision dispenses with triplicate invoices where the consignments or purchases are very small in value.

Mr. BUCHANAN. No; I do not understand it so. I understand the former part of the section authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, to dispense whenever expedient with the triplicate invoices; and the latter part of the section provides that the triplicate invoices shall in no case be required when the value of the merchandise shipped by any one consignor on any one vessel at one and the same time do not exceed $100. The discretion seems to be an absolute discretion over shipments of all sizes in the former part of the section. I would like to inquire why that discretion was given?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. The prohibition applies to those that are small in amount. I remember a reason urged was to save expense. I will state to the gentleman that just at this moment, in regard to the other part, I do not recall the basis of the recommendation, as we have come very hurriedly to this section and I have not the papers relating to the matter before me now; but I will say that this is a recommendation by the Department and when the matter was under consideration all of this part of the bill was concurred in by the entire committee. As the papers are not at this time before me, nor the subject fresh in my mind, I can only give the gentleman upon the spur of the moment the assurance I have given him, which I recognize is not as full and definite a reply as he might reasonably desire.

Mr. MILLS. This provision was first recommended by Secretary Folger and concurred in by every subsequent Secretary and by the unanimous report of the Committee on Ways and Means twice. As my friend from Arkansas has said, we have come upon this section suddenly, and so the papers are not at hand.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Is it not sufficient for my purposes to be told that it was recommended by the different Secretaries of the Treasury. I want to know if the gentleman remembers what reasons they gave for making the recommendation.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I have answered frankly about it. If the gentleman will name some objection to the provision perhaps that will suggest the reasons which led to this recommendation.

Mr. BUCHANAN. My objection is that it will make it easier to evade the proper collection of the revenue.

Mr. BREWER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman from Arkansas if the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury applied to anything more than where the amount was under $100.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Yes, the gentlemen will see that it relates to amounts, large and small. I will say to the gentleman that the committee in no case in the administrative part of the bill has adopted any provision that did not meet with the concurrence of the administrative branch of the Government. That is pretty generally the rule in regard to the administrative features of all bills. I do not mean to say that recommendations are always adopted; but I do mean to say that in no case have we ventured to set up our views in regard to what is the best mode of administering the law in opposition to the views of the administrative department of the Government. That has been the guide for both sides of the House.

Mr. BREWER. Only one word——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted.

Mr. MILLS. The administrative features of this bill are substantially the same as were in the Hewitt administrative bill reported by the Committee on Ways and Means in the Forty-eighth and Forty-ninth Congresses; and these provisions were approved by Secretary Folger, and by the Secretaries of the Treasury who have succeeded him.

Mr. BREWER. I move to strike out the last word. I have only a word to say, because I have not examined the section. There are provisions now in the consular regulations which permit the importation of goods in amounts of less value than $100, and I apprehend that the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury applied only to importations of such amounts, because it does not seem possible that it could have applied to general importations.

In many cases these invoices are made out in quadruplicate. For instance, if goods are shipped in bond from Germany to the city of Detroit, one of the invoices, with a certificate attached, is sent to the consignee, one goes to the consignor who sends the goods, another goes to the collector of customs in New York, and the fourth to the collector of customs in the city of Detroit. These are often checks upon fraudulent importations, and it can not be possible that the Secretary of the Treasury has recommended that this safeguard shall be dispensed with where the amount of goods imported exceeds in value the sum of $100. If there is any such provision in the administrative part of this bill, in my judgment it ought not to be there; and I say this after four years' experience in taking the acknowledgments of certificates to invoices as consul in the service of the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn, and the Clerk will continue the reading of the bill.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I move to amend on page 47, line 8, by striking out the word "required" and inserting the words "dispensed with."

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 13 That section 2900 of the Revised Statutes be, and hereby is, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 2900. The owner, consignee, or agent of any imported merchandise which has been actually purchased may at the time, and not afterward, when he shall make and verify his written entry of merchandise, make such addition in the entry to the cost or value given in the invoice, or pro forma invoice, or statement in form of an invoice, which he shall produce with his entry, as in his opinion may raise the same to the actual market value or wholesale price of such merchandise, at the period of exportation to the United States, in the principal markets of the country from which the same has been imported; and the collector within whose district any merchandise, whether the same has been actually purchased or procured otherwise than by purchase, may be imported or entered, shall cause such actual market value or wholesale price thereof to be appraised; and if such appraised value shall exceed by 10 per cent. or more the entered value, then, in addition to the duties imposed by law on the same, there shall be levied and collected a duty of 20 per cent. ad valorem on such appraised value. The duty shall not, however, be assessed upon an amount less than the invoice or entered value, except as elsewhere especially provided in this act."

Mr. BUCHANAN. I move to strike out in line 21 the word "appraised." I make this motion for the purpose of eliciting information and ascertaining whether I am correct in my reading of this section or not. The section provides that where goods are entered undervalued they shall be appraised, and if appraised at a value exceeding by 10 per cent. or more the entered value, then, in addition to the duties levied by law on the same, "there shall be levied and collected a duty of 20 per cent. on such appraised value."

Now, I want to know whether that means only the appraised value in excess of the entered value, or the total value of the goods. If it means the latter, my amendment is not needed, but it ought to be clear.

Mr. MILLS. This provision of the law was very carefully prepared. It was drawn by one of the best lawyers ever in the Treasury Department, Judge Folger, and it was drawn expressly to cover the point which the gentleman is talking about. The committee adopted the very language of the provision as drawn up by Secretary Folger.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I wish to know whether the construction of the gentlemen of the Committee on Ways and Means is that these words "appraised value" apply to the whole value of the goods, or simply to the excess above the entered value, because if they apply simply to the excess, then upon that portion of the importation there would be a duty collected of only 20 per cent., whereas under the general provision the duty on such goods would be 50 or 60 per cent.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the language of this provision is quite clear. The extra duty is in the nature of a punishment——

Mr. BUCHANAN. I understand that, but I understand also the dexterity of these importers in getting around the law, and I want the construction of the committee upon the bill as we go along.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I think there is no doubt that the intent of the bill is that the extra duty shall be upon the increased appraised value.

Mr. LONG. Of the whole importation?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Yes, sir; of the whole importation. It is intended to make the punishment one that will be felt. That was clearly my understanding at the time we adopted this.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I withdraw the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 14. That all invoices of imported merchandise shall, at or before the shipment of the merchandise, be produced to the consul, vice-consul, or commercial agent of the United States of the consular district from which the merchandise is imported to the United States, and if there be no consul, vice-consul, or commercial agent for said district, then said invoices shall be produced to the consul, vice-consul, or commercial agent of the district nearest thereto, and shall have indorsed thereon, when so produced, a declaration signed by the purchaser, manufacturer, owner, or agent, setting forth that the invoice is in all respects correct and true; that it contains, if the merchandise was obtained by purchase, a true and full statement of the time when and the place where the same was purchased, and the actual cost thereof and of all charges thereon; and that no discounts, bounties, or drawbacks are contained in the invoice but such as have actually been allowed thereon; and when obtained in any other manner than by purchase, the actual market value or wholesale price thereof at the time of exportation to the United States in the principal markets of the country from whence exported; and that no different invoice of the merchandise, mentioned in the invoice so produced, has been or will be furnished to any one. If the merchandise was actually purchased, the declaration shall also contain a statement that the currency in which such invoice is made out is the currency which was actually paid for the merchandise by the purchaser.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I move to amend on page 49, line 13, by inserting after the words, "state the time when and the place where," the words "and the person from whom." The object of having this indorsement upon the invoice is to give information to the consul so that he may be enabled to investigate the circumstances under which the purchase was made and be aided in preventing fraud or unfairness in the valuation. Now, it seems to me that the person who presents an invoice ought to be required to state not only where the purchase was made, but from whom it was made, because I think that as valuable information as the other, or even more so.

The amendment was rejected.

The committee rose informally to receive a message from the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. McCook, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 335) granting an increase of pension to C. R. Thomas.

The message also announced that the Senate had directed its Secretary to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (H. R. 10356) granting a pension to J. T. Vincent.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a concurrent resolution, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, providing for the printing of the report of the Joint Select Committee of Congress on the Newburgh (N. Y.) Monument and Centennial Celebration.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 297) to provide for the erection of a monument to the memory of General George Rogers Clark; and

A bill (S. 3215) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Arkansas River at or near Cummings Landing, Lincoln County, Arkansas.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a joint resolution (H. Res. 195) electing managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers to fill vacancies caused by the expiration of the terms of office of members of the present board of managers on the 21st day of April, 1888.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill (H. R. 3376) to extend the limits of the port of New Orleans.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 15. That section 2931 of the Revised Statutes be, and hereby is, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 2931. The decision of the collector of customs and of the naval officer, if any, at the port of importation and entry, as to the rate and amount of duties to be paid on any merchandise, and the dutiable costs and charges thereon, shall be final and conclusive against all persons interested in such merchandise, unless the owner, importer, consignee, or agent of the merchandise shall, within ten days after and not on any day before the ascertainment and liquidation of the duties by the proper officers of the customs, as well in cases of merchandise entered in bond as for consumption, give notice in writing to the collector, if dissatisfied with the aforesaid decision, setting forth therein, distinctly and specifically, and in respect to each entry, the reasons of his objection thereto, and shall also, within thirty days after the date of such ascertainment and liquidation, appeal therefrom to the Secretary of the Treasury, who, on receiving such appeal, shall forthwith call upon the collector for a report thereon; and the collector shall thereupon, if he adheres to his decision, set forth, specifically and in detail, to the Secretary, the reasons therefor; and the decision of the Secretary on such appeal shall be final and conclusive, and such merchandise, or costs and charges, shall be liable to duty accordingly, unless suit shall be brought, within ninety days after the decision of the Secretary of the Treasury on such appeal, for any duties which shall have been paid before the date of such decision on such merchandise, or costs and charges, or within ninety days after the payment of duties paid after the decision of the Secretary. No suit shall be begun or maintained for the recovery of any duties alleged to have been erroneously or illegally exacted until the decision of the Secretary of the Treasury shall have been first had on such appeal, unless the decision of the Secretary shall be delayed more than ninety days from the date of such appeal. And when a suit shall be brought by the United States to recover the additional duties found due on any ascertainment and liquidation thereof, and not paid, the defendant or defendants shall not be permitted to set up any plea or matter in defense excepting such as shall have been set forth in a protest and appeal made as herein prescribed."

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 50, section 15, lines 4 and 5, strike out the words "and of the naval officer, if any" and insert "or officer acting as such."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 19. That section 2927 of the Revised Statutes is hereby amended by the addition of the following words thereto:

"No allowances for damage to goods, wares, and merchandise imported into the United States shall hereafter be made in the estimation and liquidation of duties thereon; but the importer thereof may abandon to the Government all or any portion of goods, wares, and merchandise included in any invoice, and be relieved from the payment of the duties on the portion so abandoned: Provided, That the portion so abandoned shall amount to 10 per cent. or over of the total value of the invoice."

Mr. NUTTING. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

Insert, after the word "invoice," in line 12, on page 55 of the bill, the following: "And provided, No goods, property, wares, or merchandise imported or brought into this country which are dutiable under the law shall be changed from the packages or bottles in which the same were so imported or brought here into other packages or bottles until the duty on such importations by law provided shall be paid."

Mr. NUTTING. Mr. Chairman, as the law now stands dutiable merchandise may be brought into our country from a foreign country, and if these goods do not enter into the trade or consumption of this country they may be shipped out of the country again, and all this accomplished without paying the duty, or any part of the duty, by law imposed on the importation of such property.

This looks like a very innocent and harmless law, and if carried out in its full spirit and intention can do no harm. The usual practice on the part of the customs authorities in this country in regard to dutiable goods coming here which are intended to be shipped abroad again is not to allow such goods to be repacked or rewrapped, rebottled, or in any manner changed. So long as this regulation is adhered to it is quite difficult to see how harm can come from such practice. The law governing these matters, however, does not provide that such goods shall not be changed into other packages and wrappings. This being the fact, frauds have occurred and are likely to occur under this law in this way.

Peppermint oil is made largely in this country. The mint is grown and the oil distilled by farmers. This industry is carried on largely in the State of New York and in the State of Michigan. One county in the Congressional district which I have the honor to represent here—I refer to Wayne County, New York—yearly for many years has made $400,000 worth of this oil.

More than 10,000 acres of land in this one county are used to grow peppermint, and more than two thousand farmers are interested in the industry. The farmers not only grow the mint, but they distill the oil as well. This section of the county has become noted for the superior oil made. One man, Mr. Hotchkiss, has for twenty years handled all the oil made in this county. He has made a careful study of the business and has used good judgment and honest effort to make a success for himself and for the people, and has succeeded. He has all this time put this oil in bottles of uniform size and had them carefully branded and marked. He has insisted on handling only the very best and purest oils. He not only has supplied the markets here, but has shipped his oils abroad and sold them largely in Europe.

The Hotchkiss brand of peppermint oil has gained a reputation at home and abroad for purity and strength which no other oils of the kind ever gained. The importers in New York knew of the excellent reputations of these oils and desired to profit by it. So these importers last November procured the Secretary of the Treasury to make an order allowing them to bring into the port of New York Japanese peppermint oil of an inferior grade (worth no more than 75 cents a pound, while the Wayne County oil was worth nearly or quite $3 per pound), then to change that Japanese oil out of the Japanese bottles and put it into bottles of the size, shape, and appearance of the bottles in which the Wayne County oil was put up, and then this cheap Japanese oil so changed in packages was sent abroad into the markets where the Hotchkiss brand of oil had gained a reputation. This Japanese oil paid no duty at all, though there was a duty by our law upon such oil when imported.

This trick was discovered by Mr. Hotchkiss and the Wayne County farmers, and through their representations the order of the Treasury Department was revoked and the fraud stopped. But the business had been injured; Mr. Hotchkiss had been frightened and so had the farmers. And now, Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment to prevent a recurrence of any such practice in the future. This resolution will prevent this practice not only with peppermint oil but with all other property shipped in here. Why, in this instance you see the cheap labor of Japan in the shape of inferior distilled Japanese oil come in competition with American farmers and an American product. This was done by a trick and a fraud, and this amendment will put a stop to such practices.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. If I understand the gentleman, with the noise prevailing, he complains that the bottles paid no tax.

Mr. NUTTING. I beg pardon; there is a tax of 25 per cent.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Not if filled, under the present law, and this covering clause, as it is called, has given much trouble. It is repealed on page 38 of the bill, so that under this bill both coverings and contents are taxed.

Mr. NUTTING. I am not complaining about tariff on packages, but about the law which allows goods shipped in here and the package changed and so reshipped without the goods paying duty.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. We do not make it free. It is free now, and we propose to tax it.

Mr. NUTTING. By the law of 1883 on peppermint-oil there is a tariff of 25 per cent. ad valorem, but this bill makes it free. The majority of the Ways and Means Committee has agreed to strike out the clause making peppermint-oil free, and I hope it will be done.

The duty should be kept upon this oil, for the instance cited by me shows that this industry would be ruined if the cheap oils of Asia and Europe are allowed to come here free, as by this bill provided.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. The gentleman says this bill makes peppermint oil free. I did not recollect that fact, and upon reflection I think he is mistaken. It comes under the drag-net clause about essential oils, expressed oils, etc., and that was stricken from the bill upon my motion. I was saying that under the present law articles come in without any duty on the packing or wrapping. Every article named comes in without tax on the wrapping, bottles, or whatever it may be, but under this bill they will all be taxed except the boxing for machinery comprehended in the amendment I offered a short time ago.

Mr. NUTTING. The difficulty is, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] does not understand me. I wish to stop the practice of dutiable goods being allowed to come to our shores and here being changed in package and then being shipped abroad, without payment of duty, to the injury of our manufacturers and farmers, and I have in the peppermint-oil example which I have cited illustrated how fraud has been practiced and may be practiced under the law as it stands.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I see how that might apply, and evidently I did not at first understand the gentleman; but I am not prepared hastily to accept his amendment.

The question recurred on Mr. NUTTING's amendment.

Mr. NUTTING. I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and therre were—ayes 47, noes 66.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill, as follows:

SEC. 20. That any person who shall give, or offer to give, or promise to give, excepting for such duties or fees as have been levied or required according to the forms of law, any money or thing of value, directly or indirectly, to any officer or servant of the customs or of the United States, in connection with or pertaining to the importation, or appraisement, or entry, or examination, or inspection of goods, wares, or merchandise, including herein any baggage, or of the liquidation of the entry thereof, shall, on conviction thereof, be fined not less than $100 nor more than $5,000, or be imprisoned at hard labor not more than two years, or both, at the discretion of the court; and evidence of such giving, or offering, or promising to give, satisfactory to the court in which such trial is had, shall be regarded as prima facie evidence that such giving, or offering, or promising was contrary to law, and shall put upon the accused the burden of proving that such act was innocent and not done with an unlawful intention.

SEC. 21. That any officer or servant of the customs or of the United States who shall, excepting for lawful duties or fees, demand, exact, or receive from any person, directly or indirectly, any money or thing of value in connection with or pertaining to the importation, appraisement, entry, examination, or inspection of goods, wares, or merchandise, including herein any baggage or liquidation of the entry thereof, shall, on conviction thereof, be fined not less than $100 nor more than $5,000, or be imprisoned at hard labor not more than two years, or both, at the discretion of the court; and evidence of such demanding, exacting, or receiving satisfactory to the court in which such trial is had shall be regarded as prima facie evidence that such demanding, exacting, or receiving was contrary to law, and shall put upon the accused the burden of proving that such act was innocent and not with an unlawful intention.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I move the following amendment.

"Provided, however, That if upon the trial of any person or persons charged with violating the provisions of section 20 of this act, in connection with any officer or servant of the customs, or of the United States, such officer or servant shall be a witness in behalf of the prosecution, and shall testify as to the facts and circumstances connected with such charge, such testimony so given shall not be then or thereafter used against such officer or servant."

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I offered the amendment for this reason, and it seems to me it is essential it should be adopted. Section 20 provides in case of any one bribing or attempting to bribe a Government official that he shall be tried, and on conviction imprisoned. Section 21 provides any customs official convicted of being bribed shall be subject to imprisonment. Where the briber and bribee are both convicted they are both punished, one by one section and the other by the other section. What is the result? The testimony of one can not be used as against the other. This same difficulty has been met in a number of States in case of bribery at elections. I know some of them have changed the law so as to provide that the person first complaining shall go scot-free and his testimony shall be used upon the trial of the other.

I have not been able to draught this amendment as I would like, but I have draughted it so as to provide that if upon the trial of any person accused of bribing or attempting to bribe a customs official goes upon the stand in behalf of the prosecution and testifies to the circumstances, that testimony shall not be used against him. It is difficult at best to obtain testimony to substantiate these charges, and it seems to me in the interest of justice this amendment should prevail.

I think it should go further and allow him to escape punishment altogether, but in a meritorious case the judge presiding at the trial or the prosecuting attorney would enter a nolle prosequi. I desire he shall understand when he testifies as to the bribery he shall thereby be exempt from the consequences of such testifying. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. MILLS. It is already provided in the law.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 34, noes 65.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I will not make the point of no quorum, but simply recommend the amendment to the next Democratic caucus. [Laughter.]

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 22. That section 2864 of the Revised Statutes be, and hereby is, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 2864. That any owner, importer, consignee, agent, or other person who shall, with intent to defraud the revenue, make or attempt to make any entry of imported merchandise by means of any fraudulent or false invoice, affidavit, letter or paper, or by means of any false statement, written or verbal, or who shall be guilty of any willful act or omission by means whereof the United States shall be deprived of the lawful duties, or any portion thereof, accruing upon the merchandise, or any portion thereof, embraced or referred to in such invoice, affidavit, letter, paper, or statement, or affected by such act or omission, shall for each offense be fined in any sum not exceeding $5,000 nor less than $50, or be imprisoned for any time not exceeding two years, or both; and, in addition to such fine, such merchandise, or the value thereof, shall be forfeited, which forfeiture shall only apply to the whole of the merchandise, or the value thereof, in the case or package containing the particular article or articles of merchandise to which such fraud or alleged fraud relates; and anything contained in any act which provides for the forfeiture or confiscation of an entire invoice in consequence of any item or items contained in the same being undervalued be, and the same is hereby, repealed."

SEC. 23. That all imported goods, wares, and merchandise which may be in the public stores or bonded warehouses or on shipboard within the limits of any port of entry, or remaining in the customs offices, on the day and year when this act, or any provision thereof, shall go into effect, except as otherwise provided in this act, shall be subjected to no other duty, upon the entry thereof for consumption, than if the same were imported respectively after that day; and all goods, wares, and merchandise remaining in bonded warehouses on the day and year this act, or any provision thereof, shall take effect, and upon which the duties shall have been paid, shall be entitled to a refund of the difference between the amount of duties paid and the amount of duties said goods, wares, and merchandise would be subject to if the same were imported respectively after that date.

SEC. 24. That sections 3011 and 3013 of the Revised Statutes be, and hereby are, repealed as to all importations made after the date of this act; and all laws and parts of laws inconsistent with the other requirements and provisions of this act are also hereby repealed.

Mr. BYNUM. As this section affects all the other provisions of the bill, I ask that it be passed over informally, to be recurred to hereafter.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 25. That on and after the 1st day of July, 1888, all taxes on manufactured chewing tobacco, smoking tobacco, and snuff, all special taxes upon manufacturers of and dealers in said articles, and all taxes upon wholesale and retail dealers in leaf tobacco be, and are hereby, repealed: Provided, That there shall be allowed a drawback or rebate of the full amount of tax on all original and unbroken factory packages of smoking and manufactured tobacco and snuff held by manufacturers, factors, jobbers, or dealers on said 1st day of July, if claim therefor shall be presented to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue prior to the 1st day of September, 1888, and not otherwise. No claim shall be allowed and no drawback shall be paid for an amount less than $5, and all sums required to satisfy claims under this act shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. It shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, to adopt such rules and regulations, and to prescribe and furnish such blanks and forms as may be necessary to carry this section into effect.

Mr. MILLS. I desire to amend the section by moving to strike out, in line 1, "July" and inserting "October."

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. MILLS. Also, in line 10, strike out "July" and insert "October."

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. MILLS. I move further to amend the paragraph by striking out, in the twelfth line, the words "September, 1888," and inserting "January, 1889;" so it will read, "prior to the first day of January, 1889."

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. WISE. I submit the amendment I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, in line 3, the word "and" before the word "snuff" in that line, and add thereafter "cigars, cheroots, and cigarettes;" so that the clause when amended will read:

"That on and after the 1st day of October, 1888, all taxes on manufactured chewing tobacco, smoking tobacco, snuff, cigars, cheroots, and cigarettes," etc.

Mr. WISE. I do not propose to delay the committee very long upon this amendment. I have said heretofore upon the tobacco tax and the internal-revenue system generally all I desire to say in that regard. I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that we raise from the internal-revenue tax on tobacco about $30,000,000 annually. The estimated reduction, under the provisions of the pending bill, of the revenue derived from that source is about $24,000,000. If this be correct, and I doubt not that it is, we will obtain in the future by the retention of the tax on cigars, cheroots, and cigarettes only about $6,000,000, a considerable portion of which will have to be expended in its collection.

In other words, we retain a portion of this tobacco tax, not for revenue, but to give the Government supervision of the subject; and I desire to say to my Democratic friends here that the use of the taxing power for such a purpose is not in accordance either with Democratic traditions or Democratic principles.

It is proposed by the Mills bill to make certain changes in the tariff, whereby it is estimated by those who have examined the subject carefully, that the income of the Government will be reduced to the extent of $52,000,000. By the repeal of the tobacco tax it will be reduced $24,000,000 more, the total reduction amounting to some $76,000,000.

Now, I undertake to say, Mr. Chairman, that if the Mills bill shall become a law the reduction of the receipts from customs will not be, as gentlemen suppose, $52,000,000. In no other way can you be so certain of preventing the accumulation of a surplus, about which we have heard so much, as by the repeal of the tobacco tax. By lowering the rates of duty on certain articles it may be that the amount of revenue derived from the custom-houses of the country will be increased rather than diminished, and I believe that in many instances that would be the result.

What were the principal difficulties with which we were confronted when we came to this capital? The most important and pressing one was the presence in the Treasury of a rapidly-increasing surplus; and I repeat again that you can not be so certain in any other way of reducing it as by the repeal of the tobacco tax.

Thomas Jefferson, the father of Democracy, said, when he recommended the repeal of internal taxation, that it was the pride of an American citizen that he never saw a tax-collector. How changed the situation! The American citizen of this day not only sees him, but the tax-gatherer comes to his house armed with a revolver, a carbine, a rifle, or a shotgun.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. He not only sees but he feels him.

Mr. WISE. He feels him, too. The twelfth page of the last annual report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue reads like an emanation from the War Department. [Laughter.] Just listen to it for a moment, and see what it embodies:

"Ordnance stores," "rifles," "revolvers," "carbines," "belts" [laughter], "Army chests."

With an overflowing Treasury there is no necessity for the continuance of this odious tax, and my constituents are loud in their demands for its repeal.

Gentlemen, it is not a question whether you will tax tobacco or what shall be the subjects of taxation. The question is whether you will vote to continue an internal-revenue tax or derive the means of the support of your Government by a tax upon commodities imported from foreign countries. I want it to be distinctly understood that I am in favor of deriving the revenue for the support of this Government by a tax upon foreign productions imported into the United States.

Mr. NELSON. I rise to oppose the amendment, and for the purpose of having time to do so I ask unanimous consent of the committee that I may be allowed to proceed ten minutes at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. NELSON. I hold in my hand a well-considered article from Professor Richmond M. Smith, of Columbia College, upon the question of internal-revenue taxes. It contains a great many truths, and I agree with it entirely. It states the case much better and more clearly than I can, and I am sure it will do the House good to hear it read. I ask the Clerk to read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

The existence of the present surplus and its probable continuance bring up two questions demanding solution in the present session of Congress. The first is, what shall be done to get rid of the accumulation of money in the Federal Treasury, and the money which will accumulate before any laws looking to the final reduction of revenue can take effect? And the second is, in what way revenue can be permanently reduced so as to correspond with the demands of government? The first is a temporary difficulty and can be met by temporary measures. The second is much the more serious question, for it threatens to involve the whole future financial policy of the United States. I shall therefore consider it first, and devote only a few words at the close to the former. I shall also take it for granted that there should be no consideration paid to schemes for balancing accounts by extravagant expenditures made for the purpose of getting rid of the surplus, or to the absurd proposal to raise protective duties to a point where they would be prohibitive and there would be no income.

The permanent reduction of taxation is the only way of bringing the expenditures and the receipts of the Government into equilibrium. This brings us at once to the question whether this reduction shall take place in the internal revenues or in the customs duties. This question can best be approached by posing the further question: Do we want to abandon the present system of internal revenue on whisky, beer, and tobacco? They are articles which are taxed the world over as high as it is possible to tax them. They are recognized the world over as luxuries which people are perfectly able to do without. They are consumed in immense quantities, so that the revenue from them is always large. At the same time they possess in a remarkable degree the quality of elasticity, that is, when people are poor they can easily diminish their consumption of them, while in good times they can increase the quantity or the quality consumed. The burden of taxation thus naturally and automatically adjusts itself to the condition of the community. The burden decreases when people are less able to pay, while the revenue steadily increases with the prosperity of the country and its growth in wealth and population. The use of these articles is only slowly affected by changes in taste and fashion, and thus there is no danger of the revenue disappearing.

In the universality of their consumption they resemble articles of necessity, while in the possibility of the individual doing without them they are luxuries. Other articles which resemble them in the first respect, like sugar, coffee, tea, and salt are recognized as necessaries of life among all civilized nations, while other luxuries, like wine, laces, velvet, etc., are not largely enough consumed to give a great revenue and are subject to changes of taste and fashion.

It would seem to me a serious financial mistake for the Federal Government to give up such a source of revenue, which is large in itself, and which will always be a sure means of income. It is not well for the Government to rely exclusively on customs for its taxes. They depend for their imposition too much on other considerations, such as those of a protective system, and for their yield on the condition of commerce and the prosperity of trade. Many of them impose a much greater burden upon the people than they return to the Treasury. Many of them are most unequal in the way they rest on particular industries or particular classes. At any rate it is utterly impossible in many cases to determine what the exact burden is and where it really rests.

In the greater portion of our present tariff we are absolutely "going it blind" as far as the financial consequences of the impositions are concerned. No human mind can trace out the real effect of these customs duties on the industry and the social development of the people of the United States. This is said neither from the standpoint of a free-trader, nor of a protectionist, nor of a socialist. The present tariff is so complex that no one can tell how far it really aids the industries of the country and how far it cripples them. No one can tell how far it keeps up the wages of workingmen and how far it throws the burden of taxation on them. Is it not sufficient to raise two-thirds of the national revenue by these taxes, the burden of which and the incidents of which are so uncertain? Is it sound finance to abandon an income of $100,000,000 raised by a simple and easy tax on luxuries, the burden and incidents of which we do know, and raise it by taxes, the financial effects of which we do not know? To abandon the internal-revenue system means that the present revenue from customs will be insufficient or barely sufficient to meet the wants of the Government in time of peace. That means that any revision of the present tariff will be practically impossible for a long time to come, for no revision of the tariff is possible except in the presence of a surplus revenue or the means of providing a revenue in case of a deficit.

When the English revised their tariff it was with the help of the income tax. Our means of tiding over any deficiency following changes in the tariff is the internal revenue, and once destroy the organization and it will never be possible to restore it except in some great crisis like a war. But he would be a bold man who would affirm that the present tariff is perfect even from the standpoint of protection to home industries. He would be a still bolder man who would affirm that the present tariff is just in its burden on the poor man. And no man would be found bold enough to affirm that the present tariff has any claim to consideration as a financial measure. But why abandon the possibility of revision, either from the standpoint of a sound policy of encouragement to home industry, or of a sound social policy of the exemption of the poor from undue burdens, or of a sound financial policy of making the taxes as productive and as little burdensome as possible?

There is no danger of the overthrow of the doctrine of protection in this country. The Democracy is too powerful and finds representation in the legislative body too easily not to be sure to have all its wishes complied with the moment they are expressed. Democracy, too, always demands an immediate remedy for any evil it may be suffering under. Our tendency is and always will be to apply protection to any industry the moment it seems to be languishing. That has been the experience of France since the establishment of the republic. But what we want and what Democracy will want in the long is protection wisely applied. We do not want protection for everybody and for everything, for that means a burden on everybody and on everything. We do not want protection always because there has been protection once, for that means that we are to pay no attention to changes in industry and methods of protection. In other words, even from the protectionist standpoint, the tariff must be subject to more or less constant revision. It is not necessary to show that from the standpoint of social burdens and of financial policy we should also retain in our hands the power of revising our customs duties when necessary.

It would also, in my opinion, be a serious political blunder for the Federal Government to abandon the internal-revenue system. No one can tell what the future financial demands of the Government are to be. It is always well to have two strings to your bow. In case of failure of the revenue from duties owing to a depression of trade or interruption to commerce the internal revenue must make good the deficiency. In case of some financial emergency, like a war, the internal-revenue system is already established, the people are accustomed to it, and it is easy to increase the revenue by increasing the rate of taxation. In case it is abandoned the whole system will have to be re-established, and this will be a matter of time and probably of more or less friction and opposition. Some of the States will probably have appropriated the taxes, and they will have to be ousted and the United States resume the position which it ought never to have given up. It is said that the internal-revenue collector is hateful and that the man who represents simply the fiscal power of a distant government ought to be removed. I believe that is one reason why he should be retained.

The Government of the United States is the government of the whole people, and there is no reason why its officers should not be everywhere. The internal-revenue collector is no more hateful than the custom-house official, and if the frontier is to have the one why should not the interior have the other? The Secretary of the Treasury has said that the two services could be combined so that the expense would be no greater than is necessary for an efficient customs administration. It would be foolish to abandon these articles to be excised by the different States, for then we should have different rates of taxation, different administrative systems, and infinitely more expense.

Some persons advocate retaining the internal-tax revenue on whisky, but giving it up at least on tobacco. It is said that tobacco, if not a necessary of life is one of the comforts, and to the men who use it it has become practically a necessity. The tax on domestic tobacco rests on the poor and the men of moderate means, for the rich use imported tobacco. To give up the tax on tobacco would relieve the surplus to the extent of thirty millions, which would leave plenty of margin to reduce the customs.

I do not sympathize with this movement to take off the tax on tobacco. It is an attack on the internal-revenue system, and when the tobacco is gone it will be easy to remove the excise on beer and then on whisky. I do not believe that tobacco is a necessary of life in the sense that sugar, tea, coffee, and blankets are necessaries of life. I think that if we are going to help the poor man we had better give him free sugar, salt, iron tools, and woolen clothing for himself and his children. Would not the States immediately tax the tobacco if it were freed from Federal taxation, so that the poor man would still miss his cheap pipe? The tax is not a heavy one. By far the larger portion is paid on manufactured tobacco at the rate of 8 cents per pound, and on cigars at the rate of $3 per thousand. It is not a very severe burden upon the laboring man to pay to the Government one-half cent for each ounce of tobacco that he smokes and for the man of moderate means to pay one-third of a cent for each cigar.

The number of adult males in the United States is probably about 15,000,000, which would make a tax of less than $2 a head. We must also remember that this is a tax which the laboring man pays as a rule only on his own consumption, while the tax on sugar or on blankets and woolens he pays on the consumption of his whole family. If the tax is too heavy, reduce the rate. Sweep away the petty license taxes on the manufacturers, dealers, and peddlers, and make the tax simple and so that the price of the article will be increased only by the amount of the tax. I do not believe that any of the internal-revenue taxes should be used for sumptuary purposes. That should be left to the States to regulate by the imposition of licenses or by prohibitory laws.

If now the internal revenue is to be retained, the reduction must occur in the customs duties. It has been indicated above where this reduction ought to take place. The sugar duties ought to be entirely removed, then the duties on raw wool, and gradually those on woolen goods. Then ought to come the duties on salt, lumber, and other raw materials. At the same time we ought to put on the free-list all articles the duties on which are not protective and the removal of which would not affect appreciably the protective system. The sugar duties alone would relieve us of fifty millions, and should be entirely removed, for a simple reduction in the rate would not necessarily reduce the revenue in the same proportion.

In regard to the question of what shall be done to get rid of the surplus which has already accumulated and which will accumulate before the new tax laws can go into effect, I see no objection to the plan of Mr. John J. Knox to anticipate the payment of a portion of the interest on the bonds and to substitute 2½ per cent. bonds for the present 4 and 4½ per cents.

Mr. NICHOLS. I offer the following amendment:

The amendment was read, as follows:

Amend by striking out all after the word "that" in line 1, section 25, and insert the following, so that the same shall read:

"SEC. 25. That all clauses of section 3140 to section 3465, both inclusive, of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and all other laws relating to internal-revenue taxes are hereby repealed to take effect on the 1st day of December, 1888: Provided, That all laws now in force shall have full force and effect in respect to all offenses committed, liabilities incurred, or rights accruing or accrued prior to the date when this section shall take effect: Provided further, That on all original and unbroken factory packages of smoking or manufactured tobacco, snuff, cigars, cheroots, or other forms of tobacco held by manufacturers, factors, jobbers, or dealers at such time as this section shall take effect, and upon all unbroken packages, kegs, barrels, or other receptacles of distilled spirits and brewed liquors, held by distillers, dealers, or other owners of such spirits or liquors at such time this section shall take effect, there shall be a drawback or rebate in favor of such manufacturer, factor, jobber, distiller, dealer, or other owner, as the case may be, to the full amount of the tax paid thereon. Provided further, That all special-tax stamps covering taxes repealed by this act may be redeemed for the portion of the special-tax year unexpired at the time of the repeal; Provided further, That no claim for rebate under this section shall be for a less amount than $5, and all claims for rebate as herein provided for shall be presented within ninety days after this section shall take effect, otherwise the same shall be forever barred; and all sums required to satisfy claims under this section shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall adopt such rules and regulations and furnish such blanks and forms as may be necessary to carry this section into effect."

SEC. 26. That this act shall be in force from and after December 1, 1888, and all laws and parts of laws in conflict herewith are hereby repealed.

Mr. COWLES. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a substitute for that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. This is offered as a substitute for the section. It is a motion to strike out and insert.

Mr. COWLES. I propose to amend the substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment already pending to the section, which has been offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE], and is in order before the vote is taken on the section.

Mr. COWLES. But I offer a substitute for the whole section. I am satisfied, sir, that under our parliamentary law and practice I am entitled to offer this substitute for the pending section and all pending amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that this amendment is in the nature of a substitute for the section, because it is a proposition to strike out the whole section and insert in lieu thereof the words which have been read. The motion is indivisible——

Mr. COWLES. What becomes of the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE]?

The CHAIRMAN. That is first in order, because it is designed to perfect the text; and amendments to perfect the text are in order before a motion to strike out.

Mr. COWLES. I desire to offer a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE]. Am I not entitled now to offer a substitute for both the section and the pending amendments?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that under the rule for considering bills in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union an amendment is in order, and then an amendment to that amendment, after which there must be a vote thereon.

Mr. COWLES. But a substitute is in order for the whole paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. That would be in order in the House, but we are acting in committee under a special rule which confines us to amendments and amendments thereto. The Chair will first put the motion on the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE], and after that is disposed of——

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina. I wish to offer an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not in order.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina. My amendment will accomplish the same object as the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COWLES].

Mr. YOST. I desire to say, Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can recognize only one gentleman at a time.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. What is now the situation of the proposed amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment submitted by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON] to the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. YOST. I ask to be recognized on this question.

The CHAIRMAN. It is first in order to read the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "cigarettes" insert, "and all internal taxes on spirits distilled from grain or fruit of any kind."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON] is entitled to five minutes on his amendment.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, the effect of this amendment which I have offered to the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia will be to extend the repeal of the internal-revenue law beyond the tobacco tax and to include the tax on whisky and brandy. I offer this proposition for the purpose of wiping from the statute-book the law which imposes internal-revenue tax on all spirits distilled from grain or fruit. I have heard a great deal said on this floor about "free whisky" and "free brandy," and recently the representatives of the Republican party assembled in Chicago pretended to be in favor of the repeal of the internal-revenue law. I desire to see the Republicans, as well as Democrats, vote upon that question here to-day. What I desire is not only free whisky and free brandy, but I wish more to see my people freed from the oppressions of a system spoken of by my friend from Virginia which imposes upon them almost a military surveillance.

Gentlemen who live in the mountain sections of this country know that we are constantly subjected to the most annoying kind of irritations in the execution of this law. It is a law which was put upon the statute-book during a period of war, and its framers had no regard apparently to the effect it might have upon the civil liberties of the people; they relied upon the patriotism of the country to submit to such a system during the continuance of a great war; and that reliance was well met. At that time the oppressive features attending the execution of the law were less thought of than the object of raising revenue. But we have long since reached a time of peace, and all parties declare in favor of taking from the statute-book everything partaking of war legislation.

Now, if there is anything which is essentially a war measure, this system of internal-revenue taxation is one, and I desire to see it wiped from the statute-book, because I wish to see my people relieved from the exactions and oppressions imposed upon them in connection with the enforcement of this taxation during the last twenty-five years.

Just think of it, Mr. Chairman. A Federal court organized by the Government, with all the dignity which a Federal court ought to have, setting in judgment on a poor man charged with selling a half pint of liquor, and dragging him perhaps two or three hundred miles from his helpless family for the purpose of trying him for such frivolous offenses. Why, sir, such a thing reflects shame upon the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, and detracts from the high standing they should have among the people. Proceedings of that kind would better become the jurisdiction of a justice of the peace.

Mr. KERR. If this side of the House will vote with you to repeal the internal taxation, will you vote the Republican ticket? [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina. I hope my friend from Iowa [Mr. KERR] will "ask me something hard." I want Republicans and Democrats to unite here in repealing this obnoxious law. I want to blot it out because it has done so much to excite the animosities of the people all through the country, and has been the instrument of more suffering to those who are least able to bear it than any other statute I know of. Besides it fosters a system of espionage and harsh treatment which is obnoxious to all ideas of free government. It has done more to engender bad feeling in communities, to encourage false swearing, to sap the very spirit of manhood from our people, to teach them to regard the Government as oppressive toward the citizens than all other laws. Let us eliminate from the statute-book of this great country every vestige of the unfortunate strife we have passed through, so that "peace and good will" shall prevail throughout its entire length and breadth.

Why, sir, so far as concerns the section of the country from which I come, many of the citizens there scarcely know this Government, except by the exactions visited upon them under this law. They know the Government only through the army of officers sent, as my friend from Virginia has said, with carbines and cartridge-boxes for the purpose of arresting them. I want to see this country, especially my section of it, governed through some other means.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON] advocates the repeal of the whisky tax as well as other internal taxes. I will detain the House only a moment in making some comment upon the present situation so that we may see what would be wise and patriotic and practical in the matter now submitted to the House.

The internal-revenue system, if I remember correctly, yielded last year $118,000,000, and it is estimated that it will yield this year $120,000,000. The entire surplus does not amount to $70,000,000 per annum. So that if we were to embark upon a total repeal of the internal-revenue system, as proposed by the gentleman from North Carolina, we would have facing us at the threshold a deficiency of $50,000,000 per annum. So that there can only be a reduction of internal-revenue taxes if anything, and not a total repeal of the system.

Hence, in dealing with this subject of reduction of taxation, as we can not repeal the entire internal-revenue system, the question is whether we will reduce the tax on clothing and food and allow the internal-revenue system to continue, or whether we will reduce the tax on whisky. I speak my views, and I believe the views of this side of the House, when I say that in the contest between whisky and clothing, we are on the side of clothing. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, I would be glad if gentlemen who propose a total repeal of the internal-revenue system of taxation would say upon what they propose to place the additional tax.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina. If my amendment be adopted, I shall propose to put a tax upon the incomes of the country, and have an amendment prepared for that purpose.

Mr. McMILLIN. Such an amendment, unfortunately, while I should favor it, would stand no chance of adoption. I have favored that, but even when it existed it was repealed, and my friend from North Carolina must remember that that would be an internal-revenue tax and would be the extension of the system he pretends to despise.

The gentleman from North Carolina should get that adopted before he creates his deficiency. The wise man who ascends a tree to prune it does not cut off the limb between him and the body of the tree. You should see your way out before you begin the work of demolition.

Mr. Chairman, I know that occasionally gentlemen, either forgetting to study the laws of the country or ignoring them, have urged the repeal of the tax on whisky under the plea that they want the States to tax it and thereby get the revenues derived from it.

This is impractical, for the reason that many of the State constitutions require that all taxes shall be uniform, and thereby prevent the placing of a higher tax on whisky than is placed on other property of equal value. Other constitutions prevent its exclusive taxation or discriminate taxation because it is the manufacture of a product of the soil. At least half the States of the Union, under one constitutional provision or another, prevent the placing of a higher tax on whisky than is placed on other products, except the tax on the privilege of dealing in it. This is so in Tennessee, the State I have the honor in part to represent. It is in other States I could mention if my time permitted.

Besides all that, Mr. Chairman, the States have the same right to put a tax on whisky now that it would have if the internal-revenue system were entirely repealed. Why do the States not do it?

The result would be, if the system were repealed and the States could and did reimpose the tax on whisky, those States which did not tax it specially would do all the manufacturing and the other States would notg et any tax at all. It would therefore practically go untaxed. That would be the inevitable result.

Gentlemen have spoken of the injustice of the administration of the internal-revenue laws. The effort of the committee has been from first to last, and it has been I think attended with considerable success, to do away with those hardships and harshnesses which made the internal-revenue system obnoxious, and any unprejudiced mind who will look at the bill the Committee on Ways and Means has reported must admit that most of the hardships which have been complained of have been effectually done away with.

Mr. WISE. Yes, I do the Committee on Ways and Means the justice to say that the bill which they have reported does do away with them to a great extent, but still the tax is odious.

Mr. McMILLIN. I am glad my friend from Virginia admits we have accomplished the result in the pending measure which we attempted in doing away with the hardships of the system under the present law.

But we can not repeal the entire system. We have to have revenue. What is it we are asked to do? I will remind gentlemen it will take as much machinery, as much oppression, as much wrong to enforce the collection of 10 cents a gallon as it does to collect 90 cents a gallon; and for one I will oppose the reduction of the whisky tax. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I have shown that we can not repeal the entire tax. Who, then, would reduce the tax on whisky rather than the tax on sugar? Who would take 50 cents a gallon tax from whisky rather than 29 per cent. from woolen clothes? Who would prefer to remove the tax from whisky rather than from salt? Who would rather cheapen his whisky than his blankets? If there be such, let him go forth proclaiming himself for free bungs and free barrels, and we meet him with a counter proposition for cheaper clothes and cheaper food, and defy him to discuss with us before a patriotic and long-suffering people the issue thus joined. [Loud applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

The question recurred on the amendment of Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina, to the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina. I demand a division on the amendment to the amendment.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 27, noes 135.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, what was the vote?

The CHAIRMAN. Twenty-seven ayes, 135 noes. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina. Is that all? What has become of the Republican party that they fail to vote for this amendment, when they claim to be pledged to do it? [Great laughter and applause.]

Mr. NICHOLS. What has become of the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The question will be put in regular order.

Mr. SOWDEN. I would like to have an opportunity to offer an amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. YOST].

Mr. YOST. I move the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lines 2 and 3, page 59, strike out the word "chewing" and the words "smoking tobacco," and in line 5 insert after the word "leaf" the words "or manufactured;" so that it shall read:

"All taxes on manufactured tobacco and snuff, all special taxes upon manufacturers or dealers in said articles, and all taxes upon wholesale and retail dealers in leaf or manufactured tobacco be, and are hereby, repealed."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the amendment is not an amendment to the pending amendment.

Mr. YOST. It covers the same points and also provides for a repeal of the tax on all dealers in tobacco as well as the manufacturers thereof.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment only relates to cigarettes and cheroots.

Mr. YOST. This is intended to embrace cigarettes and cheroots, and it does embrace them, as it relates to all manufacturers of and dealers in tobacco.

Mr. WISE. I have not had the opportunity to examine the gentleman's amendment, but I presume his object is the same as mine; that is, a repeal of the tobacco tax.

Mr. YOST. Yes; that is the object of my amendment.

Mr. WISE. My object is to repeal the entire tobacco tax.

Mr. YOST. You do not state it then in your amendment.

Mr. WISE. But that is the object of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will entertain the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. YOST] as an amendment to the amendment upon the principle that the greater includes the less.

Mr. YOST. My colleague [Mr. WISE], in offering his amendment, of course had in view the same object which my amendment is designed to accomplish, and the truth is the gentleman has made about the same speech which I intended to make

If, Mr. Chairman, the representatives of Virginia stood as solidly on every single solitary item of the Mills bill as they stand on the tobacco feature it would be a great deal better for the State and for the people who are directly interested in the production of very many of the articles which that measure so disastrously affects. [Applause.]

Tobacco is just as much a product of the soil as corn or wheat or any other kind of grain, and why it should be insisted that you shall place such restrictions upon an agricultural product I can not understand. It is a restriction not imposed upon any other product of the soil. In time of war it is true we needed the money derived from this taxation. It then became a matter of public necessity. But that time has happily passed away, and the greatest difficulty we now have to contend with is how to get rid of our surplus revenues.

Here, as I said, is a strictly agricultural product which, it seems to me, every consideration of right demands should be placed upon a footing with other agricultural products. The burden imposed upon it should be removed. It is an unjust, inequitable discrimination which has already been too long tolerated and for the continued imposition of which no reasonable excuse can be given.

So far as the bill affects manufactured tobacco, and I refer now to the regular bill pending, it retains the tax on the manufacture of cheroots, cigars, and cigarettes. The rest of the tax is repealed. That may be all right so far as the interests of the large manufacturing establishments are involved. They doubtless want this restriction. But, Mr. Chairman, it is not all right so far as the small manufacturers in our tobacco districts throughout the Southern States are concerned.

Here are cigar-makers carrying on little establishments at many of the cross-roads—poor men, men who are dependent on their own labor—who are forced to sell their manufactured product on sixty and ninety days' time, and yet the revenue tax must be paid at once. It is not only unfair to them to be required to pay for the privilege of manufacturing, but it is a grievous wrong to compel them to pay the tax upon the product as soon as it is manufactured and yet have to wait two or three months for their money. They are not able to do it. Their capital is their skill and labor. This they must employ to the best advantage in order to gain a livelihood at all. They must sell their product and get a quick return for it or they must retire from the business. To remove practically all of the other restrictions upon the manufacture of tobacco and retain the tax on cigars means the crushing out of the individual cigar-maker and a concentration of the business in the hands of large establishments.

I know, Mr. Chairman, that cigar-makers of the North—those who live in the large cities—have petitioned Congress to retain the tax on cigars. It may be to their interest that this should be done, but it is not to the interest of the cigar-maker of the South, who owns his own little establishment and wants to turn his time and skill to the best account. His desire and the desire of the people I represent is that the whole system of internal revenue, so far as it relates to tobacco, shall be wiped out.

They want this odious supervision of the General Government abolished. They want the privilege of raising tobacco and disposing of it as they may think best, and without having a Federal officer nosing around their doors or the fear of technical violation of law and consequent cost and trouble continually overshadowing them. This is a matter of simple justice to them, and I hope there will be no objection. [Applause.]

Mr. BYNUM. Mr. Chairman, I am free to say that as an abstract proposition I was and am still opposed to any reduction of the internal taxes. I consented to the reduction made in the bill under consideration because it was demanded by a considerable section. The section that I represent does not favor any reduction of internal taxes upon tobacco. They are willing, however, to submit to this reduction provided they can secure the benefits that they think will be derived by them by the enactment into law of the other provisions of the bill.

I can not consent, however, that we shall go further than was agreed upon by the committee. The tax upon cigars, cigarettes, and cheroots does not fall upon the farmers who raise the tobacco, but wholly upon the consumers of the same. I do not intend in the short time which, under the rules of the House, is given me to discuss the reasons as to why a tax should, in my judgment, be levied upon tobacco and liquors. I simply desire to call the attention of the committee to the fact that a repeal of the tax upon cigars, cheroots, and cigarettes would be a most serious blow to a large body of organized laborers. It would, in my opinion, completely destroy the cigar-makers' union. The internal-revenue system has proved a great benefit and protection to both the manufacturer and employé. Under its operation the brand of the manufacturer is protected and the tenement-house system, where women and children were compelled to labor in poverty and suffering, has been broken up. Take all the tax off of these articles and you at once deprive the laborers employed in this industry of any power to protect themselves.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Let me ask if these people are opposed to this reduction?

Mr. BYNUM. Yes; they are opposed to it for the very reasons that I have given.

Mr. WISE. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. BYNUM. Certainly.

Mr. WISE. If you retain the tax on cigars, cheroots, and cigarettes do you not necessarily have to give to the Government supervision of the whole subject of tobacco?

Mr. BYNUM. Not of the whole subject, but only of the manufacture and sale of these articles.

Mr. WISE. It would be impossible to prevent frauds unless the Government had full supervision; and in order to collect the tax you must enable the Government officers to have full access, just as under the present law. You are compelled to give the Government authority to examine into it.

Mr. BYNUM. Certainly. The Government would have the same supervision over the manufacture and sale of cigars, etc., that it now has; but that does not extend over the whole subject of tobacco. The bill reduces the licenses, retaining only a nominal sum, and the law is otherwise modified for the benefit of the manufacturer. Every cigar-maker in the country, so far as I have any knowledge, is in favor of the retention of the tax and the continuation of the present system, and I am positive there is not a cigar-maker to be found but what is opposed to the total repeal of the present law.

I represent near five hundred employés engaged in these industries, and in their interests and in their behalf I hope this amendment and all others of like character will be voted down.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the amendment is exhausted.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. YOST].

Mr. MILLS. If there is to be no further debate, I ask a vote. If there is, I move that the committee rise. [Cries of "Vote!"]

The question was taken on the amendment to the amendment submitted by Mr. YOST; and there was a division—ayes 68, noes 87.

Mr. YOST. I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

Mr. YOST and Mr. MILLS were appointed tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 54, noes 85.

So (no further count being demanded) the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SOWDEN. I offer a further amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, which I have already sent to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the amendment:

"And all internal-revenue taxes on spirits distilled from apples, peaches, and other fruits."

Mr. GROSVENOR. Is debate in order?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

[Mr. GROSVENOR withholds his remarks for revision. See APPENDIX.]

[Mr. LANE withholds his remarks for revision. See APPENDIX.]

Mr. MILLS. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having taken the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue, and had come to no resolution thereon.

VETO MESSAGE—MARY FITZMORRIS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following veto message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I return without approval House bill 9520, entitled "An act for the relief of Mary Fitzmorris."

It is proposed by this bill to pension the beneficiary named therein as the widow of Edmund Fitzmorris under the provisions and limitations of the general pension laws. The name of the beneficiary is already upon the pension-roll, and she is now entitled to receive precisely the sum as a pensioner which is allowed her under this bill.

As her application to the Pension Bureau was quite lately favorably acted upon, it is supposed this special bill for her relief was passed by the Congress in ignorance of that fact.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, July 16, 1888.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the message be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

The SPEAKER. Senate bill 2515, to provide pneumatic gun-carriages for the War Department, was erroneously referred to the Committee on Appropriations. It should have been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, to which it will now go, and the Committee on Appropriations will be discharged from the further consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER announced the following as the Select Committee to Inquire into the Importation of Contract Laborers, Convicts, and Paupers:

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CLARDY. I ask unanimous consent that the House take a recess at 5 o'clock to-morrow until 8 o'clock, the evening session to be devoted to the consideration of bills reported by the Committee on Commerce for the establishment of light-houses, life-saving stations, and bridges.

Several members objected.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. MILLS. I move the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

SITES OF PUBLIC BUILDINGS, ETC.

Mr. SPOONER. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to report favorably, with amendments, the bill (H. R. 6153) to authorize condemnation of land for sites of public buildings, and I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered at this time.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read at length for information, subject to objection.

The Chief Clerk read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANDERSON. I understand that the bill in its original text simply provides for the condemnation of property by the Secretary of the Treasury that is to be used for court-houses, post-offices, etc.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska desire to interfere with action on the amendments of the committee?

Mr. MANDERSON. No, sir, but simply to ask as to their character. It certainly would be desirable that the provisions of the bill should extend to other Departments, so that in the event that land may be taken for fortifications or for military posts condemnation as to such lands may also be had. I should like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin whether these amendments have that in view.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator from Nebraska is correct in his statement that the bill as it came from the House confers the right of condemnation simply for the purpose of acquiring lands for public buildings, and is confined to the Secretary of the Treasury. The amendments read thus far proposed by the Committee on Public Lands extend the scope of the bill so as to bring any public officer within its provisions who is authorized by law to acquire property for any public use. It will embrace fortifications or any public use legally justifying the exercise of the power of eminent domain.

The next amendment, which will be read at the desk, is one which simply provides that the proceedings in the Federal courts shall conform, as is now the law as to actions at law generally throughout the country, to the practice and proceedings and methods in similar actions in the courts of the States for the time-being within which the Federal court is located.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I should like to ask the Senator who has charge of this bill a question for information. We have in the State of New Jersey two cases, I think, where it seems there was an omission in passing the bills in Congress to give the power of condemnation because it was not deemed necessary. It has been found to be necessary. There were bills passed at the present session of Congress in both cases. This bill, I presume, could not be retroactive sufficiently to cover those cases, and I wanted to inquire if there was in the amendments the committee has reported anything that would cover cases of that kind, where the purchases have not been made and the buildings have not been commenced.

Mr. SPOONER. I will say to the Senator from New Jersey that this bill will cover all cases where it is desirable to acquire land for public uses, no matter when the authority was conferred by Congress.

Mr. MCPHERSON. This, then, is a general act?

Mr. SPOONER. It is a general act.

Mr. MCPHERSON. It will make unnecessary in the future any power of condemnation being specially provided in such bills.

Mr. SPOONER. Undoubtedly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment of the committee will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to the bill as a new section the following:

SEC. 2. The practice, pleadings, forms, and mode of proceeding in causes arising under the provisions of this act shall conform, as near as may be, to the practice, pleadings, forms, and proceedings existing at the time in like causes in courts of record in the States within which such circuit or district courts are held, any rule of the court to the contrary notwithstanding.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPOONER. To answer an inquiry which has just been addressed to me by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON], and to bring the fact to the attention of other Senators, I will say that this bill is drawn so as to bring it within the scope of the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Kohl and others vs. The United States, found in 1 Otto, page 367.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to authorize condemnation of land for sites of public buildings, and for other purposes."

Mr. SPOONER. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and request a conference with the House of Representatives thereon.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. SPOONER, Mr. VEST, and Mr. PASCO were appointed.

LIST OF TREASURY DEPARTMENT EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. MANDERSON. There came to the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury transmitting a list of the employés in his Department during the year 1887. The accompanying document is very voluminous, and in the opinion of the Committee on Printing it is not well to print it, but it should remain on the files of the Senate. I therefore ask that an order be made that the document be not printed, but remain upon the Senate files.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Do the Committee on Printing report an order in writing?

Mr. MANDERSON. No, sir; but I submit that order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order will be entered according to the suggestion of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is it, Mr. President?

Mr. MANDERSON. It is a list of the employés of the Treasury Department for the year 1887, showing the amounts received by them and the time each one worked. All this information is, of course, in the books of the Treasury, and is also in the Biennial Register. It hardly seems necessary to go to the expense of printing it again. Therefore we report it adversely.

The report was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. GIBSON introduced a bill (S. 3341) for the relief of Cora A. Di Brazza; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. GEORGE (by request) introduced a bill (S. 3342) granting a pension to David Myers; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MANDERSON (by request) introduced a bill (S. 3343) to provide for the organization and maintenance of the National Guard; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. MANDERSON. The purpose of the bill, as I understand it, is to convert the militia organizations of the country into a national guard under the control of the General Government. I am not at all in accord with the idea of the bill, but present it by request. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HEARST introduced a bill (S. 3344) for the relief of Jannette A. Gray; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SABIN introduced a bill (S. 3345) to authorize the Winona and Southwestern Railway Company to build a bridge across the Mississippi River at Winona, Minn.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PASCO (by request) introduced a bill (S. 3346) granting to the Canaveral and South Florida Railroad Company, for the construction of a railroad from Titusville, in Brevard County, Florida, to the Bight of Canaveral, with a branch to the Banana River in said State, the right of way through the public lands, with depot and terminal facilities; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

SHIP ISLAND QUARANTINE STATION.

Mr. WALTHALL submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to inform the Senate what steps, if any, have been taken for the removal of the National Quarantine Station from Ship Island to some other point in the Gulf of Mexico, under the provisions of the act of March 5, 1888, authorizing such removal and making an appropriation therefor.

CRAIG'S IMPROVEMENT IN TELEGRAPHY.

Mr. BLAIR. I offer the following resolution, and ask for immediate action thereon:

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules be directed to arrange with D. H. Craig, of New York City, a suitable place in the Capitol building for testing his improvements in the art of telegraphy, with a view to the protection of the interests of the American people in such improvements if they shall be found valuable and Congress shall deem the same to be expedient, the sole object of this resolution being to facilitate the convenient examination of said improvements in practical operation and to involve no expense to the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator desire to have the resolution referred to the Committee on Rules?

Mr. BLAIR. I should like to have it acted on at the present time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. PLATT. I do not know anything about the matter, but it seems to me a resolution of that kind ought to be referred to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. BLAIR. I will state in a moment what it is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. BLAIR. I hope the Senator from Connecticut will make no objection.

Mr. PLATT. I do not make an objection.

Mr. BLAIR. The Mr. Craig mentioned in the resolution was the founder of the Associated Press in this country. He is a gentleman about seventy years of age. For the last thirty years he has been practically connected with telegraphy, and he has made what are understood to be very great improvements in the art. He is in control of his inventions entirely, by which, it is said, by those competent to judge of the matter, that an ordinary message, which now is sent to different parts of the country for from 25 cents to a dollar, can be sent for from 15 cents to 25 or 30 cents anywhere within the country, and that where 400 words are now transmitted it is easy to transmit at least 2,000.

The matter is wholly in the control of this gentleman; and the only object of the resolution is that there may be an opportunity for such examination or inspection of the practical operation, as it now has been operated over a route of more than 400 miles, that if it is deemed best the Government may secure this great improvement, and it will not pass into the hands of private individuals. That is the object of the resolution.

Mr. PLUMB. I object to the present consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution lies over under objection.

THE FISHERIES TREATY.

Mr. TELLER. I gave notice yesterday that if I were well enough I would proceed with the discussion of the fisheries treaty this morning. I do not feel able to do so to-day, and I should like to have my notice stand for to-morrow on the same terms.

NEW YORK POST-OFFICE EMPLOYÉS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from yesterday.

The resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. HALE was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Postmaster-General be, and he is hereby, directed to send to the Senate, at as early a date as is practicable, copies of all testimony of letter-carriers in the New York post-office, taken by Henry Rogers, post-office inspector, or by his direction, on or about July 12, 1886; also copies of other testimony of letter-carriers and clerks in the New York post-office which was taken by a committee of post-office inspectors in the months of October and November, 1886, all of said testimony having been forwarded to Chief Post-Office Inspector West.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to know what kind of an inquiry and testimony this was. What is the character of the testimony that is wanted? What was the investigation?

Mr. HALE. One of the objects of the resolution is to ascertain the character of the testimony. It was taken by the Department at the time indicated in the resolution and was followed by sweeping removals. The committee that is investigating this and kindred subjects matter believe it to be a subject of enough importance to call for the testimony taken, so as to see if in that testimony there is any justification for the sweeping removals which followed.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is to ascertain the cause of removal. As not enough of them were made, I have no objection to investigating the cause.

Mr. HALE. It may be that the testimony will show that the Department withheld its hands at once.

The resolution was agreed to.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask leave at this time to report from the Committee on Appropriations, with amendments, the bill (H. R. 10540) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes. I submit with the bill a report and also some testimony taken by the committee in the consideration of the bill and amendments proposed. I ask that the report and the testimony be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered, if there be no objection.

Mr. ALLISON. I also desire to give notice that at some early day I shall ask the Senate to consider the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Meanwhile the bill will be placed on the Calendar.

RETIREMENT OF JOHN C. FRÉMONT.

Mr. HALE. In accordance with the notice I gave yesterday, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 2395) authorizing the President to appoint and retire John C. Frémont as a major-general in the United States Army.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator from Maine informs me that he gave notice that he desired to call the bill up this morning at this time. I had given notice later in the day that I wished to press the bill which the Senate was discussing yesterday, which is the unfinished business. He assures me that this bill will take no discussion, and I do not wish to antagonize the bill with that understanding, because I think probably it would take less time time to pass it than to dispose of it otherwise by discussion.

Mr. HALE. I am aware how desirous, and properly desirous, the Senator from New Hampshire is to go on with his bill, and on that account I do not propose to take up any time of the Senate by any remarks on this bill. I have given some little attention to the subject and had some remarks to submit, but at this stage of the session I am more anxious for the progress of business than to make a speech, and I shall take no time of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill moved by the Senator from Maine?

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. President, when this bill was called up on a former occasion I asked the Senator from Maine to let it go over until I could get a response to the Senate resolution of the 11th of May, calling for information from the Departments in relation to the number of officers, judicial officers, officers of the Army, and officers of the Navy and Marine Corps who had been placed upon the retired-list. I desired to get that information because I intended to make it the occasion for some general observations on the subject of the retired-list.

The Secretary of the Treasury has sent in the answer to the resolution of May 11 as to judicial officers, showing that twenty of the judges have been placed on the retired-list, and showing the amount of pay which had gone to each since his retirement, and the aggregate amount which had gone to all of them, which is some three hundred and sixty-odd thousand dollars. The list shows that one of the judges alone since his retirement has received $72,500.

The Secretary of War has also, in response to the resolution, sent in a statement of the number of Army officers who have been placed on the retired-list, the rank from which they were retired, and the rank in which they were retired (for many of them were promoted on retirement), the amount of longevity pay given to those who had received longevity pay since their retirement, and the aggregate amount of money paid to each, and the aggregate paid to all of them.

The report shows, I believe, that about seven hundred and ninety officers of the Army have been placed upon the retired-list. The aggregate amount of money which has been paid them up to March last was sixteen million five hundred and odd thousand dollars. Three of the officers have received since their retirement over $100,000 each.

The answer from the Navy Department has not yet been made. I inquired in the Navy Department two or three times about the delay, and was advised that the list was an extensive one and required a great deal of labor to get up a reliable report. When it went to the Treasury Department the Fourth Auditor advised the Secretary of the Navy that the information required could not probably be furnished during the life of this Congress with the clerical force at its command, and suggested the Congress be applied to for some additional force to facilitate the obtaining of the information. I went to the Department, for when the name of each officer was given, the date of his retirement, the rank which he had held before retirement, and that into which he was retired, and this information was all given, and there was nothing to do but to indicate by figures the amount of pay and allowances, and longevity pay, I could not understand why it was that the delay should necessarily be so great, and I went to the Secretary of the Treasury with it. I was advised, however, that there were not personal accounts kept with the different officers of the Navy, and that it was necessary in order to make the answers reliable as to amounts that the auditorial force should go through the rolls of the various paymasters of the Navy. I have taken no steps so far to obtain additional clerical force, and I have been less inclined to do so because it seems that the Senate is committed to the idea of an extended retired-list, and I had some fears that no additional assistance could be obtained for that purpose.

As I recollect, the Fourth Auditor stated incidentally that there had been perhaps about fifteen hundred officers of the Navy and Marine Corps retired. As to what the amount of their pay will be I have no information, but undoubtedly very much larger than that of the Army, which is already over sixteen and a half million dollars.

When this information comes in it is my intention, more for the purpose of addressing the country than the Senate, to call attention to what I conceive to be the great dangers of the retired-list. The reports are to come up to the first of last March. A few weeks ago the Senate passed a bill authorizing the retirement of about eighty additional officers, with no specific limitation, and there is no telling how many will be retired under that authority. Then there were individual cases of retirement during this Congress, and Congress is augmenting the list continually.

The case now before the Senate of General Frémont is that of a citizen who has been distinguished in the service of his country. He stands high among the people of the United States, but he has been out of the service twenty-four years, and it has been twenty-six years since he rendered any military service, according to the report of the committee, the closing paragraph of which is that——

He was appointed major-general, United States Army, May 14, 1861, and commanded the Western Department from July 25 to November 19, 1861; unemployed to March 28, 1862; commanding the Mountain Department to June 28, 1862; unemployed to June 4, 1864, upon which date he resigned.

I do not intend to occupy the attention of the Senate at any great length at this time, because I expect in the future to try to make a much fuller exposition of this subject.

The practice of the Government and the theory of the Government from the beginning until about 1861 was that when officers entered the public service they performed their duties and accepted their pay, and when they retired they became citizens again, with no advantages over other citizens, with no special privileges not accorded to all. Now, if I am right about there being fifteen hundred on the naval-list—about which I am not absolutely certain—there are altogether some twenty-four or twenty-five hundred who have been placed on the retired-list. Many of these are persons of ample fortune; many of them are men as vigorous as almost any Senator here in physical ability to perform duty, and yet they are retired upon high pay. It seems to me that we have entered upon a course which, if persisted in, can not fail to change the character of our Government and to establish in it a privileged class, a class which in other countries is designated by the name of aristocracy, a class living off the labor of other people and rendering no service in recompense therefor.

I know, sir, that it is urged as to these officers that when they have been worn out in the service it is the duty of the Government to take care of them. I had a report in my hands and intended reading it on a former occasion, but under the five-minute rule I failed to do it, and I have mislaid the paper, in which it appears that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] inquired of the Navy Department the reasons for the creation of this Navy retired-list, and the answer of the Assistant Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Fox, as I remember it, was that it was for the purpose of improving the naval service and to get rid of the drunkards and imbeciles in the service. The report from the Navy Department was made two years ago, in which the cause for retirement was required to be stated. Frequently you see the statement "retired for moral unfitness for service," "mental unfitness," "moral and mental unfitness," which I suppose is that a man gets drunk and is not fit for anything. Men who so act, who so violate their duty to their country when in its pay have, it seems to me, no title to be a burden upon the American people for the rest of their lives upon high salaries.

I can conceive that there may be exceptional cases where it may be right for the Government to take care of persons who are no longer fitted for the public service; and a broad exception to the position I have taken is in relation to pensioners. I believe it to be the duty of this Government and of any government when its citizens have been disabled in the military service and rendered incapable of supporting themselves or their families to give them reasonable aid to take care of themselves. But public officers are persons who get privileges and favors that other people seek and can not get. When they have obtained those positions they have not only obtained official rank with Government pay, and generally high pay, for the services rendered, but they get social position and advantages in every way over the citizens of the country who can not obtain such employment.

Now, Mr. President, it seems to me hard that the thousands of men who can not obtain such employment, who remain in the walks of private life, although discharging their duties as citizens, rearing families and educate them by their own industry and toil, should have to be taxed for the support of men who have been favored above them by the Government. It seems to me hard. If we are entering upon a mission of charity, if this Government is to be turned into a mere eleemosynary establishment, it seems to me that there should be some discrimination, something like a Christian charity exercised by selecting the most helpless and the most needy for our benefices instead of bestowing them on those of the highest rank and best pay and best position in society. That would seem to me, if we are entering upon a mission of charity, the way we should go on. That is not, however, the way we are doing. We are rapidly building up a class which, through their influence and through that of the kindred of members on the retired-list, may exercise an influence too great for the control of Congress and may become the masters of the situation.

Why, sir, I saw in a newspaper a few months ago some town had been laid out in New Jersey expressly for the purpose of being a settlement for retired officers. So I suppose they must not be contaminated by an association with common people who have to work for their living. Think of it! A town laid out for the benefit of retired officers! Whether it was a trick to sell the lots or had some other end in view I do not pretend to say; but at any rate we are building up a privileged class in violation of the theory of our Government, in violation of the principles of common right, and it ought to be arrested.

If we are going to retire men simply because they have been eminent, perhaps General Frémont is as fit subject as any for retirement. But remember that he has for twenty-six years rendered no service to the Government. I do not know what claim he has over the thousands of other citizens, and millions I might say, who in public or in private life have discharged all their duties as good citizens and who though in private life, unlike him, have received no salaries, but have, by their own industry and energy, supported themselves and their families.

I simply desired to enter my protest against this as I have in every case involving retirement, not in the hope of arresting it at present; but I think that when the information comes from the Navy Department, if Senators will examine that which comes from the Treasury, the War, and the Navy Departments, they will see that the time has come when it is necessary for the welfare of this country that they should consider how far they are going to go in this business of retiring men and billeting them upon the country to be supported by the labor of men as good as themselves and who have to labor for their own support and for the support of this privileged class.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PLUMB. On the 11th of this month the Senate appointed conferees at a further conference with the House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes upon the amendment to the Post-Office appropriation bill, known as the subsidy amendment. For the purpose of moving that the Senate recede from its amendment, I ask unanimous consent that the action of the Senate appointing conferees be reconsidered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered, if there be no objection.

Mr. PLUMB. I now move that the Senate recede from its seventh amendment to the Post-Office appropriation bill.

Before the motion is put I wish to say a word. I have here a slip which contains a quotation from the report of the British consul-general at Havana, recently made, in which he says:

Commercially speaking, the Americans have annexed the island.

Referring to the Island of Cuba.

They already take upwards of 90 per cent. of the exports, supply 20 per cent. of the imports, and have nearly one-third of the carrying trade. They run almost all the steamers between it and their ports, and are beginning to invest largely in mining and other enterprises; so much so that their good-will has to be considered in all matters of commercial policy. During the last financial year the declared value of Cuban products shipped to the United States from Havana alone exceeded $18,000,000.

I have the best of reasons for believing that a large portion of this result has been reached by reason of the policy of the Government of the United States by which intercourse between the United States and Havana has been quickened. We paid last year, as we paid the year before, $268,174.04 for special mail facilities between Philadelphia and Havana, which of course practically means between New York and Havana, $228,000 of which was paid to railroads in order to enable them to make greater speed than they had before that time made, and $40,000 was paid to a steam-ship line for running 200 miles from Tampa, via Key West, to Havana. We paid, therefore, more for the steam-ship service on the mail route between Tampa and Havana, a distance of 200 miles, than we paid for the steam-ship mail service rendered to the United States on all the lines between United States ports and South and Central American ports. I believe that if the United States would spend a reasonable sum of money in doing for the intercourse between the United States and Central America and South America just what it has done without opposition during the past five years for similar intercourse between the United States and Havana, all the British consuls at those ports would be able to place with their Government a similar record with that which I have read as given by the British consul at Havana to his Government in regard to the rapid increase of American influence and of American commerce with the Island of Cuba. But for some reason or other—I do not care to go into it now—the House of Representatives and the party which dominates it through its Executive have determined that they will not have any of this.

I therefore move, in view of the vote of the House of Representatives and the influence I have spoken of, which can not be overcome even under the pressure of a prospect of the kind of which I have spoken, that the Senate recede from its amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas moves that the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 7 to the Post-Office appropriation bill.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, the Senator from Kansas in charge of this bill makes a motion that the Senate recede from its amendment, and then proceeds to make an argument showing that it should not recede. I suppose that he desires the Senate to vote to recede upon the supposition that it is impossible to obtain the amendment or obtain the appropriation for which it provides so long as this amendment is insisted upon by the Senate; and therefore I suppose the motion will pass without any decided opposition. I merely wish to say that I am not in favor of it and shall vote against receding.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to recede.

The motion was agreed to.

RETIREMENT OF JOHN C. FRÉMONT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the bill (S. 2395) authorizing the President to appoint and retire John C. Frémont as a major-general in the United States Army; which is open to amendment as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HALE. I understand the main objection urged by the Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] to be not against this bill particularly, but against the system of retirement. I do not propose to go into that question on this occasion. I rise simply to ask that there be printed in the RECORD a statement of the public services of General Frémont; and content with that I ask for a vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be printed in connection with the remarks of the Senator from Maine.

The statement is as follows:

GENERAL JOHN CHARLES FRÉMONT.

Senator HALE recently introduced a bill authorizing the President to appoint General Frémont to the Army and then to place him on the retired-list with the rank of major-general. John Charles Frémont was born on the 21st of January, 1813, in Savannah, Ga., of French descent, his father having been a French emigrant to this country. Though left an orphan at the early age of four years, he received a good education, graduating at Charleston College, South Carolina, at the age of seventeen years. He taught mathematics and turned his attention to engineering, having received a commission as lieutenant of engineers in the United States Army.

Subsequently most of his time was for several years occupied in Government surveys and explorations in the Rocky Mountains. In 1842 he explored the South Pass, and his exploits during the Mexican war gave him much renowned distinction. Colonel Frémont was one of the first of the two Senators from California, serving from 1849 until 1851. In the year of 1856 he was the Republican candidate for President of the United States, in opposition to James Buchanan, the Democratic candidate. In 1861 and 1862 he was a Major-General of the United States Army, and became governor of the Territory of Arizona from 1878 until 1882. No man can claim the glory of the true American by a better title than Colonel Frémont, who has mad e the knowledge and the dev elopment of the resources of this continent the great end of all his exertions, and has pursued it with a self-sacrificing devotion. His name is stamped indelibly, with an imprint that can never be obliterated, over the whole breadth of its geography.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I am opposed to this bill and all similar bills. There is no justice, equity, or right in it. It is against the rules and principles which ought to govern the organization of the Army. The retired-list of the Army was made for the benefit of those in actual service upon actual duty. It is not a pension-roll for anybody, however distinguished. It was intended for the benefit of the regular Army and to make it effective. Officers of the regular Army were liable to become disabled by reason of age or disease contracted in service in the line of duty or wounds received in battle. The youngest officers as well as the oldest were liable to these casualties. The question was what should be done with these officers so disabled for active duty. If they are retained in the service they will receive and be entitled to receive the full pay of their respective ranks and grades, and yet they will render no equivalent service to the Government. Fairly and legitimately they could not be promoted, particularly in the Navy, as there a physical examination is essential to promotion, while the same rule does not hold in the Army, though it should hold. Then in order to relieve the Army of this incubus, this weight, this load of incapacitated officers, provision was made for their retirement. They are to be taken out of the active-list and placed upon the retired-list; and there, instead of drawing their full pay, they receive three-fourths of their pay proper, and their places are then filled by promotion.

Mr. President, this retirement of officers is not a very ancient thing. The first law enacted upon that subject was the act of August 3, 1861, which is found in 12 Statutes at Large, page 289. The sections to which I refer, sections 15, 16, and 17 of that act, read:

SEC. 15. And be it further enacted, That any commissioned officer of the Army, or of the Marine Corps, who shall have served as such for forty consecutive years, may, upon his own application to the President of the United States, be placed upon the list of retired officers, with the pay and emoluments allowed by this act.

SEC. 16. And be it further enacted, That if any commissioned officer of the Army, or of the Marine Corps, shall have become, or shall hereafter become, incapable of performing the duties of his office, he shall be placed upon the retired-list and withdrawn from active service and command and from the line of promotion, with the following pay and emoluments, namely: The pay proper of the highest rank held by him at the time of his retirement, whether by staff or regimental commission, and four rations per day, and without any other pay, emoluments, or allowances; and the next officer in rank shall be promoted to the place of the retired officer, according to the established rules of the service. And the same rule of promotion shall be applied successively to the vacancies consequent upon the retirement of an officer: Provided, That should the brevet lieutenant-general be retired under this act, it shall be without reduction in his current pay, subsistence, or allowances: And provided further, That there shall not be on the retired-list at any one time more than 7 per cent. of the whole number of officers of the Army, as fixed by law.

SEC. 17. And be it further enacted, That, in order to carry out the provisions of this act, the Secretary of War or Secretary of the Navy, as the case may be, under the direction and approval of the President of the United States, shall, from time to time as occasion may require, assemble a board of not more than nine nor less than five commissioned officers, two-fifths of whom shall be of the medical staff; the board, except those taken from the medical staff, to be composed, as far as may be, of his seniors in rank, to determine the facts as to the nature and occasion of the disability of such officers as appear disabled to perform such military service, such board being hereby invested with the powers of a court of inquiry and court-martial; and their decision shall be subject to like revision as that of such courts by the President of the United States. The board, whenever it finds an officer incapacitated for active service, will report whether, in its judgment, the said incapacity result from long and faithful service, from wounds or injury received in the line of duty, from sickness or exposure therein, or from any other incident of service. If so, and the President approve such judgment, the disabled officer shall thereupon be placed upon the list of retired officers, according to the provisions of this act. If otherwise, and if the President concur in opinion with the board, the officer shall be retired, as above, either with his pay proper alone or with his service rations alone, at the discretion of the President, or he shall be wholly retired from the service, with one year's pay and allowances; and in this last case his name shall be thenceforward omitted from the Army Register or Navy Register, as the case may be: Provided, always, That the members of the board shall in every case be sworn to an honest and impartial discharge of their duties, and that no officer of the Army shall be retired, either partially or wholly, from the service without having had a fair and full hearing before the board, if, upon due summons, he shall demand it.

And then sections 21 and 22 provide:

SEC. 21. And be it further enacted, That any officer of the Navy who has been forty years in the service of the United States may, upon his own application to the President of the United States, be placed upon the list of retired officers of the Navy, and shall receive the pay and emoluments allowed by this act.

SEC. 22. And be it further enacted, That if any officer of the Navy shall have become or shall hereafter become incapable of performing the duties of his office, he shall be placed upon the retired-list and withdrawn from active service and command and from the line of promotion, with the following pay and emoluments, namely.

Mr. President, that was the beginning of the retired-list, and its object is plain; and the present law in respect to retirement is substantially the same as the sections of the act of 1861 I have quoted, except that the pay and allowances of retired officers are now three-fourths of the pay proper. Under that law a large number of officers have been retired. I hold in my hand Senate Executive Document 179, Fiftieth Congress, first session, being a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to Senate resolution of April 11, 1888, a list of officers placed on the retired-list, which shows the names of the officers, their rank before retirement, the rank with which retired, the date of their retirement, the date of death, resignation, dismissal, etc., the cause for which retired, annual retired-pay and allowances when retired, the increase by reason of longevity, the aggregate annual pay last received, and the aggregate paid up to and including March 31, 1888. This is an interesting document and shows the extent to which the retired-list has now been carried.

Mr. President, I also hold in my hand House Executive Document No. 111, Forty-ninth Congress, first session, "Officers on the retired-list of the Navy," being a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the House, a list of the officers on the retired-list of the Navy on February 24, 1886, with a statement showing the relative rank of each officer, date of his retirement, annual pay, and reasons for retirement. My friend from Texas I suppose referred to this document when he was discussing this question, and giving the grounds upon which many officers have been retired.

Mr. REAGAN. I spoke particularly of the grounds upon which Navy officers were retired.

Mr. COCKRELL. This is the Navy list. It would be interesting, doubtless, to most of the tax-payers of the United States to read over this list of the number, relative rank, date of retirement, annual pay, and reasons or grounds for the retirement of naval officers, and I am sure that many would wonder how men could be pensioned upon the tax-payers of this country with the records staring them in the face that this document shows.

Mr. President, I also hold in my hand House of Representatives Miscellaneous Document No. 211, Forty-ninth Congress, first session, "Retired Army officers," letter of the Secretary of War in response to the resolution of the House of Representatives of March 16, 1886, requesting a full and complete list of officers now on the retired-list of the Army, with their respective ranks or relative ranks, annual pay and allowances. This seems to be almost a similar document to the one I first referred to, Senate Executive Document No. 179, Fiftieth Congress, first session. At first we limited the retired-list to three hundred; but if I mistake not in 1876 or 1877, or about that time (for I have not had an opportunity to refer to the statutes), a little amendment was tacked on to an appropriation bill without the knowledge of one solitary member of the Committee on Military Affairs, of which the distinguished Senator from Illinois, General John A. Logan, was then chairman, and of which I had the honor of being a member, by which amendment thus put into an appropriation bill the retired-list was increased to four hundred; and, strange to say, that additional increase of one hundred was made to the retired-list very largely from junior officers, and not from the oldest officers.

That bill is the existing law, providing for four hundred on the regular retired-list. At this session of Congress the Senate has passed a bill providing an increase of that list to the number of eighty, which is not to be a permanent part of the retired-list, but is a necessity in order to weed out from officers who are supposed to be on active duty in the Army those who are utterly and physically unable to perform duty. If Congress had not intervened through sympathy and friendship and personal feeling to fill that list as it has done in a number of instances by personal bills, there would have been more room for officers on active duty.

Mr. President, this is quite a large number, four hundred and eighty upon the regular retired-list of the Army, besides those who are retired by special act of Congress. Why should Congress pass these special bills? Does not the law provide for all the officers of the Army in the service? The law was passed for the officers of the Army in active service, and for them alone. Why do Senators come here and bring in these special bills to place a man back in the Army, and put him upon the retired-list? It is simply a resort to enable that citizen to draw money from the Treasury.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Does not the Senator from Missouri sometimes make exceptions himself, and was there not a notable exception made by the aid of his vote in the case of Fitz John Porter?

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes, sir, there was. That was purely an exceptional case. But suppose I did one wrong, does that justify me in doing two? Just admit that in that case——

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. If the Senator from Missouri designs now to admit that he did wrong in that case, of course I have no objection to his saying so.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am not admitting anything of the kind, but take the theory the Senator is throwing at me that I once voted for a thing, is that any reason why if that was wrong I should turn around and do so again? No, Mr. President, if I did wrong then I ought to repudiate it at the first opportunity, and I have moral courage enough to do it too.

Mr. President, that is not the question. Fitz John Porter has nothing in the world to do with this case. There is no parallel. That was purely an exceptional case. In this case I say that this is simply a mode of pensioning a civilian upon the tax-payers of the United States, and as there is no precedent for pensioning a civilian in a civil position and giving him annually so much money from the Treasury this is a subterfuge to take him and make him an officer of the Army and then give him the pay.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri whether Fitz John Porter was not a civilian when he was put on the retired-list?

Mr. COCKRELL. Oh, yes. Again we have that hobgoblin that always comes up, poor Fitz John Porter. If the distinguished Senator from Iowa will have a military commission appointed consisting of such distinguished officers as Schofield and others, which will examine the military record of John Charles Frémont, and come in here and say to the Senate under their official oaths that a great wrong has been perpetrated upon him, and that he has by reason of excitement and prejudice been deprived of an official position in the Army to which he is legally entitled to be reinstated, and then a distinguished Republican President, commander-in-chief of the armies and navies of the United States, like the lamented General Ulysses S. Grant, shall then present before the country his written indorsement and sanctification of that report of the military commission, and the matter shall come before the Senate in that shape, I will then vote for John C. Frémont as I did for Fitz John Porter.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. That case can not happen in regard to General Frémont.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then there is no parallel between them.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. No; General Frémont never was guilty of the failure that occurred in the other case.

Mr. COCKRELL. General Fitz John Porter was court-martialed once.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. That occurred in the other case.

Mr. COCKRELL. John C. Frémont was court-martialed and dismissed from the Army of the United States, as the record shows.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. He was afterwards in the Army.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is very true. He was afterwards put in the Army by favor and grace, just as this effort is made to put him on the retired-list.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. And a very distinguished Senator of the olden time from the State now in part represented by the Senator from Missouri, sought very earnestly to reinstate him on the ground that great wrong had been done.

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes; he thought a great injury had been done to his son-in-law. The great Benton thought that injury had been done to the gentleman who married his daughter against his wishes and consent. That is all there was of that. Who blames him for it? I am not criticising that; but that is the fact; everybody knows it; it is current history. As a matter of course Mr. Benton did what he could for the reinstatement of his son-in-law in the Army; no doubt about that, and nobody censures him for it.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Doubtless the Senator from Missouri will not say that Mr. Benton did what he knew to be wrong; in other words, did not do what he believed to be right.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am not determining whether his action was guided by sympathy or by judgment. That is for the world to determine. I have nothing to do with that. That question does not come up here at all.

Now, Mr. President, all these efforts to place civilians upon the retired-list are an indirect way of giving them a pension, a gratuity of a certain amount. It is an indirect way, it is an evasive way of placing a civilian in such a position that he can draw a certain amount of money out of the Treasury without being called a pensioner. I am opposed to it in toto. I do not believe that it is just to the officers of the Army. I do not believe that it is just to the tax-payers of the country.

Mr. President, this thing of exercising the sympathy of Congress in this manner only originated in the memory of many Senators on this floor, some of whom were in the public service when it began. The first retirement that I can find in the list by special act of Congress was in 1872, only sixteen years ago. Then the system of operating upon the sympathies and social position of Senators and Representatives was inaugurated and efforts were made to place gentlemen on the retired-list, and quite a number have been placed upon the retired-list since that time. They have been placed there by special acts of Congress; and there are quite a number of them on the retired-list yet.

The aggregate amount paid for the retired-list of the Army since 1861 was $16,530,947.86 up to the 31st day of March, 1888. The increase in the pay of these officers by reason of longevity has been $889,774.71.

I see no reason why General Frémont should be placed upon the retired-list of the Army any more than hundreds of others who were once in the regular Army, and also in the volunteer Army, and hundreds of others who were in the volunteer Army alone. Others performed as distinguished services during the war of the rebellion, held as important commands, and rendered as effective services in behalf of the integrity of the Union and the Union cause. There is a distinguished citizen of Missouri, whose name is a household word among soldiers, General A. J. Smith. He is now a civilian. There are many others, hundreds of others I might say, whose names are as "familiar as household words" to the soldiers of the Army whose services were equally distinguished. I do not believe that Congress should be affected by mere sympathy, by mere friendship, by mere social influence. I am opposed to this bill, and I ask upon its passage that the yeas and nays may be had.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the passage of the bill the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] asks for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DAWES (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. BATE (when the name of Mr. HARRIS was called). My colleague [Mr. HARRIS] is paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL].

Mr. SABIN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA] on this question. If he were here, I should vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. PLATT (after having voted in the affirmative). I am paired for the day with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM], and not knowing how he would vote if present, and as I see many of his colleagues are voting nay, I withdraw my vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut withdraws his vote.

Mr. CULLOM. I desire to announce that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] is paired with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL], and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY], as I understand, is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER].

The result was announced—yeas 29, nays 21; as follows:

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had yesterday approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. 341) granting a pension to William Knight, Jacob Parrott, and John Whollam;

An act (S. 2385) granting a pension to Caroline R. Haseltine;

An act (S. 1307) to increase the pension of Washington T. Otey;

An act (S. 1539) to increase the pension of James E. Gott; and

An act (S. 2301) to increase the pension of Manhattan Pickett.

ACCOUNTS UNDER THE EIGHT-HOUR LAW.

Mr. BLAIR. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 405, which is the unfinished business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 405) providing for the adjustment of accounts of laborers, workmen, and mechanics arising under the eight-hour law, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. STEWART.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. President, I do not think there is any more sincere and earnest friend of the men who labor for their living than I am. I think my whole public life has demonstrated that fact. For the last twelve or fourteen years while I have been in Congress I have allowed no opportunity to pass where I might do anything towards striking down class legislation and towards securing to every man the fruits of his own labor—that I have not done what I could do in that direction.

We shall be told and have been told that this is a measure in the interest of laboring men. If it was a measure in the interest of all laboring men alike and involved no improper principle, it would have my support; but as a measure in favor of a few laboring men at the expense of a great many laboring men, it will not have my support.

It has been made apparent from what has been said upon this subject that the persons whom it is proposed to benefit by this bill have no legal rights, and I suppose that will not be controverted, because the bill itself is founded upon the idea that they have no legal rights. As they have no legal rights, we should inquire what equitable rights they have to such action by Congress as is here proposed.

In directing attention to that inquiry it is safe to say that all those who secure employment under the Government are considered by themselves and by others of their class to be fortunate and favored by the fact that they get employment under the Government. Hundreds and thousands seek such employment, and have always done it, who could not obtain it. Those who succeed in getting that employment prefer it, because as a rule the pay is better and because the pay is certain. Those who succeed in getting that employment under an arrangement which they have agreed to, and who have been paid according to their express and implied contract, come now and ask Congress for the passage of a law to go back for twenty years to take up the case of each one and inquire whether he labored more than eight hours a day, and if he did to authorize him to bring suit for the recovery of the pro rata amount which would be due for the time he served over eight hours of each day, and, as is suggested by a Senator near me, very likely and in a large measure the case is to be heard upon ex parte testimony.

If these persons when they obtained this employment were more fortunate than their neighbors, if their contract has been satisfied by payment, what right have they to ask that their brother laborers shall now be taxed to give them more than they bargained for and to give them an additional amount to that which they accepted for their services? It is too common, I think I am warranted in saying, that we seem in Congress never to know the rights or the claims of anybody but those who seek to plunder the Treasury. It seems to me that it is but seldom that we think of the men who labor and toil, who earn the money that goes into the Treasury. We seem only to exercise our liberality in giving away the public money to those who may chance to be our special favorites. Is there never to be an end of this? Are we to have such raids as this perpetrated upon the Treasury without limit, always in favor of those who can vote? Is it to be imagined that such a bill as this would ever have come here if it had not been for the number of votes it was supposed its passage would control; and do men forget, and will they continue to forget, that the time may come (and God grant it may be soon) when it will be found that the millions who are plundered have votes as well as the thousands for whose benefit they are plundered?

I have never represented a class that plundered the Treasury for any purpose. I have felt that my duty in Congress was to represent the people who support this Government by their taxes. I have felt it to be my duty to guard their interests and protect them, and I appeal to the masses of the people who support this Government against the few who plunder it.

How much is this to involve? The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] suggested probably two or three, or possibly at the outside, four millions of dollars, I believe. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES], I believe, in speaking of this bill, said that between the passage of the law of 1868 to the period of the President's proclamation, less than a year after that, on this account there had been $700,000 for service of less than one year. Now, if you multiply that by 20——

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator will allow me to say that I did not understand that to be the statement of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. REAGAN. If I have misstated it he will correct me.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not so understand it.

Mr. REAGAN. The Senator who made it will understand it. I wish to say——

Mr. DAWES. I have not looked at the RECORD, and therefore I do not know what I did say which is referred to; but I have a clear recollection of what was the estimate of the Department and of the general character of the reply. The estimate at the Department when the paragraph alluded to was inserted in an appropriation bill in 1872 was that it would take about $700,000 to meet the obligation. The report from the Treasury Department is that every one as to whose claim that he had worked more than eight hours a day there was no dispute had been paid, and without being able to find that report I have this general impression. I did not intend to state that there was actually paid out of the Treasury the sum of $700,000. I will not state that the Government said beforehand, before that section was introduced into the appropriation bill in 1872, that it would take that amount to respond to it.

Mr. BLAIR. If the Senator will allow me, on this point I can set him right. The report of the House committee on substantially this bill at the present Congress declares that after a personal examination of the matter by the member making the report, Mr. TARSNEY, the amount actually paid on that estimate of $700,000 was less than $25,000—some $23,000 and a fraction. That is the fact as it stands.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. President, the other wing of this Capitol once passed a bill, the friends of which said it would not involve over $30,000,000 expenditure. The next report afterwards by the Commissioner of Pensions showed that it involved about $800,000,000. All that has been said on the subject of the amount due is purely speculative. The nearest to anything that can be relied upon is what was stated by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES], and that is that the liability stated in the most favorable form, the form in which he now puts it, would be about $700,000. If you multiply that by twenty it makes $14,000,000, and I doubt, if this bill is passed, if the Government get out of it for less than $10,000,000, though I do not speak from any accurate knowledge, nor can any other Senator speak from knowledge. Any of us may make speculations; but the number of men employed by the Government in various parts of the country through twenty years must be very great.

In considering the equities about this demand, there is another feature that ought not to be lost sight of. If men work eight hours in a day they ought to be paid for eight hours' work. Many men having families to support or obligations to meet or necessities of some kind to meet are anxious to work more than eight hours out of twenty-four. No law ought to deny them the privilege of working the number of hours they desire to work. If it is desired to say that a day's work is eight hours, I shall not object to that, but I shall object, if eight hours is put down, to saying that a man who works eight hours has earned as much as a man who has worked ten hours.

It has been advocated on this floor by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] that we ought to absolutely limit the hours of work to eight hours, for the purpose of giving employment to a greater number of men. I do not understand the value or force of that sort of reasoning. Eight hours of faithful labor may be as much as men ordinarily should work; but many men, as I have suggested, will desire to work all the hours they are able to work to enable them to support their families and to enable them to meet their obligations, and no law that prevents them from doing so or prevents them from being paid for the number of hours they do work can be justified on any principle of right.

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] yesterday made an argument to show in substance that the man who worked eight hours ought to be paid as much as the man who worked the whole day's work at ten hours, and quoted various authorities for it, and among others he quoted the authority of President Cleveland. I was amazed, because I had never understood him to be a demagogue. I have always believed him to be a brave and honest man. When I came to look at the authority upon which the statement was made I found that it was second-hand authority. It may be that the statement was made, but I would rather hear it from him before I should come to the conclusion I must come to in reference to such a statement as that.

Why is it that we shall bind the Government to pay more for work than other people pay? Why is it that we shall fix the value of a day's work arbitrarily without reference to the question of supply and demand? Have Senators thought of the consequences of such a doctrine? If we do that, why not fix by law the value of corn, of wheat, of flour, of beef, of bacon, of clothes? Why not put it by law at a fixed price? Is there any more reason for fixing the value of a day's labor, independently of the amount of work done, at a specific price, than there would be for fixing the value of any other commodity at a fixed price? Is there any more reason for disregarding the law of supply and demand in the one case than there is in the other? I suppose when the Senators think of it they will hardly insist that we are to fix an arbitrary standard of value for labor or for anything else without reference to the law of supply and demand.

If Senators are anxious to relieve labor, to show their patriotic interest as to the needs of the poor and the humble, we have a broad field for statesmen and philanthropists before us. Let them begin by striking down the laws that rob the masses for the benefit of the few. Then the people will understand where their friends are; then the poor will understand that they do find some one who favors the poor and humble against the rich and powerful. The greatest work any patriot, any statesman, can do in this country now in my opinion would be to lead in the work of opposing class legislation that is building up millionaires on the one hand and multiplying paupers and tramps on the other.

I can understand very well when gentlemen mean to give every man the fruits of his own labor, when they mean that every man shall have the equal protection of the laws, and that no man shall have privileges and benefits not extended alike to all. That I comprehend; but this thing of selecting out a special class which has votes, and bestowing largesses upon them from the Treasury to secure party advantages, never commanded the approbation of my reason, nor does it command my respect.

How many suits will be brought? The bill says that as many of these claimants may combine in one suit as see proper, but there must be a separate judgment for each of them and a separate record for each of them. How many millions of dollars of costs is the Government to be mulcted in? How much is it to pay on ex parte testimony? When they are hunting for money there is a class of men who remember things twenty years off a great deal better than what occurred yesterday, and you will find that kind of memory abundant whenever you put this law in force and such men are called as witnesses.

Mr. President, I do not think I ever caught myself appealing to classes for the low purpose of catching votes, and it is almost too late in life for me to do it now. I do earnestly desire to see such laws passed as will give protection to all people alike and as will strike down the means of robbing and plundering the great mass of the people in order that we may build up a moneyed aristocracy in this land.

Take up the principles that involve the administration of this Government and the enactment of its laws for the last twenty-five years, and they have steadily and gradually tended to build up a strong government—stronger than Hamilton or Knox ever advocated—and to build up an aristocracy which will be as overpowering, if not checked, in a few more years as the aristocracy of Great Britain. That moneyed class control the press. They can control speakers; they can control popular elections; they can and do control, to a large extent, the policy of this country, and they control it against the interests of the great mass of the American people, against right, against reason, and against justice.

This is but one small step in the direction in which we are traveling to hunt up classes and to legislate for classes; and in this case, as I stated, a class which has no legal right, and the very bill before us admits that it has no legal standing and must rely upon this law before it can go into court at all, which has no equity. Because they obtained employment that others were not fortunate enough to obtain, they now ask, having been more fortunate than their neighbors, that their neighbors shall be taxed—neighbors who work as hard as they do, who work as many hours as they please, whether eight or ten or twelve—that they shall be taxed some millions of dollars for the benefit of these people.

Mr. President, the eight-hour law may do in factories; it may do in Government employment; but some persons advocate it indiscriminately. Adopt it generally, and what will be the result in this agricultural country of ours? You can not make crops on eight hours a day. The ground is too wet; you are delayed. When it gets into condition to plow and to hoe you must make up the hours you lost before it becomes too dry, and the farmer finds it necessary to work from the rising to the setting of the sun, and with no Government pay either, but to be plundered for the benefit of pets of privileged classes. When it is threatening rain the hay-maker and the gatherer of the crops, as all well understand, can not carry on their work by this eight-hour rule without great sacrifices. You can not get the people of this country to adopt it. It is so against their interests, it is so against their policy to adopt it.

I do not know that it is sought by any except those who work for the Government and those who work in the factories, and, perhaps a few friends of labor, so called, who never work, but go about through the country agitating and trying to make the people believe they are continual and great sufferers because to have to work at all. There are some very wild notions afloat just now, notions which if carried into effect will give serious trouble hereafter. True policy and justice require that we should pursue that course which will be just to all alike, and give special advantages to none, which will teach men that they are to earn the money they get, and that they are not to get up schemes to plunder the Treasury and enrich themselves at the expense of others.

I hope this bill will not pass.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PLATT in the chair). The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART].

Mr. STEWART. I desire to explain the amendment, but before doing so——

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will permit I should like to have the amendment read before he proceeds.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add as section 3 the following:

It shall be unlawful for any officer or agent of the United States to make any contract or arrangement whereby any laborer, workman, artisan, or mechanic shall perform more than eight hours' labor in any one day, or shall receive for his services performed in any one day more than the wages for one day's labor, except as herein otherwise provided; nor shall there be any deduction from the amount of the wages of any laborer, workman, artisan, or mechanic by reason of the limitation to eight hours' work. Whenever the laborers, workmen, artisans, or mechanics in the employ of the United States are unable to perform the labor required working eight hours per day, other persons shall be employed to perform such extra or additional work: Provided, That in case of emergency where the laborers, workmen, artisans, or mechanics engaged on any particular work or undertaking are unable to perform the necessary labor in eight hours to meet the necessities of the case, and other persons can not be procured to perform such extra labor and meet such emergency, a special contract may be made with the laborers, workmen, artisans, or mechanics engaged on such work to perform additional hours of labor, and to receive a corresponding additional compensation. Any officer or agent of the United States who shall willfully violate the provisions of this section shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof be fined in any sum not exceeding $500.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, without regard to votes, I am in favor of this bill. I disclaim advocating it on any such consideration. I have not changed my views with regard to this matter for the last twenty years. I advocated in the Senate the original law which fixed the hours for labor at eight hours per day, believing, as I did, that that was for the benefit of society, for the benefit of laborers, and for the elevation of the people.

I then believed, and still believe, that it is necessary for every laboring man to have some leisure, some hours for rest, some hours for study, some opportunity to improve himself, some opportunity to acquire an understanding of this Government, some opportunity to understand the manipulation of legislation by which monopolies are created, some opportunity to know how to cast his vote so that monopolies may not grow up and fatten upon his labor, and some opportunity to protect himself against schemes to enslave him. It is idle to talk against monopolies until the laboring men have sufficient leisure to acquire a knowledge of their rights and to defend them at the polls.

It is well that this bill has relation to voters. My object is to give the voters an opportunity to meet the issues of the day, for to them we must appeal—not to monopolies, but to voters—if we would correct the abuses in legislation which now exist. It is their verdict that must determine all political and economic questions depending on legislation. If they are worked as slaves, if they are worked ten, twelve, or fourteen hours a day, as has been the case, they can have no opportunity to meet the responsibilities of free men.

In my opinion eight hours will ultimately be found excessive. I hope the time will come in this country when no man will work in excess of eight hours per day. With the present machinery, with the improvements which are constantly being made in all the appliances for producing mechanical results, eight hours' labor will be more effective than slave labor for twelve or fourteen hours a day.

When we find hundreds and thousands out of employment, who need work to support their families, why impose excessive hours on those who are fortunate enough to obtain employment and deprive them of the opportunity of acquiring that knowledge necessary to defend themselves in this country as freemen from oppressive legislation, and exclude from the means of living a vast multitude of others who are forced to be tramps for the want of employment?

The original law, intended to set the example on the part of the United States to the whole country of fixing eight hours as a day's labor, has been misconstrued, trampled upon, and disregarded by special contracts and by jobbing arrangements. It has not had the intended effect of teaching the country the benefits of this system which it would have had if it had been faithfully executed. Because it has not been faithfully executed this bill of relief is necessary. If the Government of the United States will allow for twenty years an act of this kind to be disregarded it ought to pay the penalty; it ought to show that we meant something by the original act; that it was not merely for political purposes.

The amendment which I have offered, I think, will remedy some of the difficulties and prevent the necessity of more bills of this kind. I will read it and explain its different provisions:

That it shall be unlawful for any officer or agent of the United States to make any contract or arrangement whereby any laborer, workman, artisan, or mechanic shall perform more than eight hours' labor in any one day.

That will prevent not only working more than eight hours, but it will prevent letting jobs whereby one man can get twelve, fourteen, or fifteen hours' labor in any one day. It was assumed and advocated here that it would be right to let them have piece-work and do three or four days' work in one day. What is the effect of that? The effect is to destroy the health of men by overworking them; and also to exclude others from obtaining work to support their families. This is wrong.

Let them have as much piecework as they please, provided the piecework does not amount to more than the compensation for a day's labor. If a man can do that in two hours, all the better. If he wants to do more work, then let him find another job. The United States will bear an even hand and will allow every man to have his labor evenly divided, so that every laborer who is required in the Government service shall have his eight hours' labor, and the few will not monopolize the work to the exclusion of others equally entitled to employment.

In every trade and in every pursuit in the country there is a constant tendency to the monopolizing of labor and crowding others out, to the injury of those who must labor to live. Let the work of the Government be fairly divided; let no man in the United States be paid for more than one day's labor in one day, whether he gets it by job work or otherwise.

This amendment further goes on:

Or shall receive for his services performed in any one day more than the wages for one day's labor, except as herein otherwise provided; nor shall there be any deduction from the amount of the wages of any laborer, workman, artisan, or mechanic by reason of the limitation to eight hours' work.

Nothing shall be deducted from his wages because he works only eight hours. It provides further that when the laborers on the Government works are not sufficient more shall be employed.

It meets the argument frequently used that a necessity may arise when the work of others can not be procured. The amendment provides for an emergency of that kind, as follows:

Whenever the laborers, workmen, artisans, or mechanics in the employ of the United States are unable to perform the labor required, working eight hours per day, other persons shall be employed to perform such extra or additional work: Provided, That in case of emergency, where the laborers, workmen, artisans, or mechanics engaged on any particular work or undertaking are unable to perform the necessary labor in eight hours to meet the necessities of the case, and other persons can not be procured to perform such extra labor and to meet such emergency, a special contract may be made with the laborers, workmen, artisans, or mechanics engaged on such work to perform additional hours of labor and to receive a corresponding additional compensation.

Mr. SPOONER. I should like to ask the Senator from Nevada a question, with his permission.

Mr. STEWART. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. Take the case of an engineer, a man who is employed about an engine with which he is entirely familiar. The machinery falls into disorder and breaks. Does the Senator mean that the superintending officer shall not employ the engineer out of hours, or the fireman on an engine which he is running from day to day, unless he shall first endeavor to secure outside men to do that work?

He might very well prefer, and so might the engineer or the fireman, to make the repairs on the engine which he is using and running every day; but under this amendment, as I understand it, in a case of that kind the superintending officer, the officer within whose jurisdiction this man is at work, would be obliged under penalty of imprisonment or fine——

Mr. GEORGE. We can not hear the Senator.

Mr. SPOONER. I say, that under this amendment, as I understand it, if an engine breaks down, and the superintending officer desires that it shall be repaired, and the interest of the Government demands that it shall be repaired, and it is for the interest of all that it should be done by the man who was at work day by day running that engine, the superintending officer would be obliged to seek some outside man to repair the engine under penalty of fine or imprisonment before he would be at liberty to employ the engineer having it it in daily care and charge to make the repair, no matter if it took but a half hour of his time or an hour of his time, and however willing he might be to render the service. Does the Senator intend that his amendment shall be as far-reaching as that?

Mr. STEWART. The language would not be as far-reaching as that.

Mr. SPOONER. I think so.

Mr. STEWART. No.

Mr. SPOONER. It says:

That in case of emergency, where the laborers, workmen, artisans, or mechanics engaged on any particular work or undertaking are unable to perform the necessary labor in eight hours to meet the necessities of the case, and other persons can not be procured to perform such extra labor—

Then and only in that event may the artisan or mechanic be employed out of hours. Under that, as I read it, there first must be an attempt, and an attempt in good faith, to secure some outside man to render that service.

Mr. HAWLEY. If the Senator will permit me, I think it would have to be done every day, because the engineer must be at work every day before the eight hours begin to get his engine in readiness. It requires two engineers to run a ten-horse engine.

Mr. SPOONER. Very likely.

Mr. STEWART. I do not think there is anything in that.

Mr. SPOONER. I feared the amendment might be altogether too restrictive.

Mr. STEWART. I do not think there will be any trouble about that.

Mr. SPOONER. Might there not be in the case I put?

Mr. STEWART. I suppose if a man washed off his engine there would not be any trouble about that. In case the engine should break down, of course the man understanding it would be the only man to take hold of it and do the work. If there was a break down and there was time to employ other men, let them do it. But they often work men to death in that way. I do not think there is any difficulty about that. I think it is sufficiently guarded.

It requires a very stringent law to carry this out when there is a disposition to evade it, a disposition on the part of employers to evade it and on the part of laborers to submit in order to get employment. I do not think, however, the Government of the United States is running any work that it can not do with eight hours' labor. In case of a breakdown, if nobody understands it sufficiently to take it up, of course there would be no violation of this law to have the man in charge go on and do the work. It would be practically impossible to get a man in time.

The law will be reasonably construed. I do not think it goes too far. You need rather strong language or it will be evaded as it was before.

It is very easy to talk about this as a buncombe measure, as a measure to catch votes. It is very easy to smother bills of this kind because the laborers are not here to advocate their adoption; they are not here to pass them; they are not organized for that purpose; they are not corporations with agents here. I am thankful that they are organizing and discussing labor questions, for I think good has come of it and good will come of it.

If we have liberal laws which do not discriminate against labor, the laborers will submit to rules and regulations which are reasonable in themselves, and there will be no fear of disorders or strikes. The more intelligence we have among the laborers, the less likely we shall be to have trouble. The more intelligent they are, the more they understand the situation, the less likely they are to give trouble, the less likely they are to rise in their wild power and destroy things.

Too frequently it happens when strikes occur that the laborers have had no opportunity to understand the situation; no voice in framing the laws which produced that situation. They are too often treated as machines to work out an end, and not as intelligent men to co-operate in great undertakings. The further the laboring man is removed from that vile servitude called slavery the more useful he will be to himself and his employer.

The laborers of this country are in the vast majority; they must be consulted; they must finally determine every question upon which the fate of this nation depends. What fair-minded man will say that it is proper for the laboring man to devote more than eight hours a day to toil when he is compelled to inform himself how to vote and preserve the liberties of this country? Time to acquire intelligence is necessary to prepare the voter to determine all the great and complicated questions arising in this Government. It is absurd to argue that drudgery alone will fit a man to discharge the high duties of American citizenship.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. STEWART. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. I have in my mind one case of a skillful mechanic, a man of good health and of sober and industrious habits, whose wife is ill, is an invalid, and it is absolutely necessary that that man should work out of hours in order to pay for medicines and for a nurse and for medical attendance, and at the same time support his family. He is willing to do it. Should the law deprive him of the right to do it?

Mr. STEWART. I will suppose another case——

Mr. SPOONER. No; answer this. Should the law deprive him of the right to do it?

Mr. STEWART. Yes; if he worked for the Government.

Mr. SPOONER. If that is a good rule for the Government is it not a good rule for others?

Mr. STEWART. It is a good rule for anybody. Suppose ten men with sick wives and families to support have no employment whatever and no money to buy medicine, would you provide for only one sick family, or would you divide the work, so that each sick family might have some medicine? Besides, if a man has a sick wife and family he wants some time to nurse them.

It will not do; there is no way you can turn it that a human being should be turned into a machine and worked longer than eight hours a day at manual labor. If he is an ambitious man and has a wife to support, there may be other things he can do. But I am fixing a rule that will elevate men and give them a chance to labor and to live. There is no chance for the laboring man to improve his condition if he has to work ten or twelve or fourteen hours a day. That is one reason why laborers have been kept down.

They have been working an unnecessary number of hours while hundreds of thousands have been deprived of bread altogether because there was no work for them. Wages in this country are such that if a man is economical eight hours' labor per day will support him, not as well as he ought to be supported perhaps, but better than in any other country on earth. You will not pay him any more if you require him to work twelve or fourteen hours, he will not be benefited by it, and it is by no means certain that his employer will be benefited. You make paupers or criminals of thousands of others for want of employment, whom the employer is taxed to feed or punish.

It is a fearful loss to crowd a large portion of the working community out of employment and cause them to become tramps or criminals. It is inconsistent and absurd. Eight hours is enough, and a man in eight hours will perform as much service in a lifetime, and perhaps a great deal more, than he will at twelve hours a day.

He will do nearly as much in a given day of eight hours as he will in twelve. He will do a great deal more per hour. He is fresh and able to labor, and his work is worth a great deal more. In the mines and elsewhere we find that the eight-hour shifts accomplish about as much as the ten-hour shifts. You get about all the vigor and force there is in a man in eight hours' active work, and that is enough; then let him rest.

The system of working men more than eight hours does two things. It overworks those who do work and renders them incapable of performing the dûties of citizens of the United States by depriving them of the means of intelligence and information, and it throws out of employment thousands of others to become a burden upon society. It is wrong in every aspect.

This amendment I hope will pass, not for political purposes, but for the elevation of the laboring classes of this country. It is time that we should commence to consider their rights and interests, because upon their intelligence and virtue the independence and perpetuity of this Government depend. They do not depend upon your rich men; they do not depend upon the monopolists; they depend upon the great mass of the laboring men of this country. Why should we set an example of exacting from them such burdens that they can not prepare themselves for the duties of American freemen? I say more than eight hours' work does destroy a man's capacity for the duties of an American freeman by depriving him of the means of informing himself and giving him the rest and recreation necessary in order to perform the duties of a citizen properly.

I should like to see a proper law passed upon the subject. As soon as Congress passed an eight-hour law Government officials and everybody attempted to do away with it by special contracts and by every conceivable device. Of course the laboring men who are obliged to labor to feed their families will submit to any arrangement that their employers will make. That has been the difficulty; it is the difficulty all over the world. Laboring men have been forced during all time to submit to the exactions of their employers. If the employers say twelve hours, as they do in Europe generally, twelve hours it is. If the employers say ten hours, ten hours it is. But when the employers say eight hours in this free America it will be eight hours, and eight hours will be more effective than twelve hours in any other part of the world.

With eight hours' labor our laborers would be doubly more effective than any other laborers on earth working twelve or fourteen hours. They would be men, and not slaves. It would be intelligent, and not degraded labor. That is what we must aim at, and that is what our legislation must be directed to.

I am tired of hearing men denounced as demagogues and as trying to catch votes whenever there is any legislation proposed for the mass of the people. There is no demagogism about this. If you give people time and do not work them to death they will understand their own interest and not be deceived by demagogues. But what chance has a man, after twelve hours' work, to discover the arts of demagogues and protect himself at the ballot-box? Do you talk about legislating against monopolies with a backing of overworked and depressed people behind you, who have no time to see what you are doing? I say nothing can be done for reform faster than the people demand it, and the people can not demand it until they understand it. They must have time.

Believing, as I said, in the eight-hour law, I hope my amendment will be adopted to make it effective.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, I do not see how this Government is to escape paying certain sums to certain laborers proposed to be relieved by the bill. The Government passed a law declaring that eight hours should be a day's work. It was a very simple proposition. In case men worked nine, ten, or eleven hours in the face of that law, were requested to do so, and did so for whatever reason, I do not see how we are to escape the plain letter of the law and refuse to pay them something; just exactly what it is to be I do not know. By the provision of this bill it is to be ascertained through an application to the Court of Claims. So far I am willing to go, and that whether I had been in favor of the eight-hour law in the first place or not. It has nothing to do with the general equity of that question at all. It seems to me to be simply a matter of legal obligation.

I did hope that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] would withdraw his proposed amendment. It is not necessary. In a certain sense it may be said to be germane, but the bill itself aims only to pay a certain debt incurred many years ago. Now he proposes to enter into the general field of legislation concerning hours of labor, and has made remarks at great length addressed to the general considerations usually taken into mind on that subject.

I object to the amendment decidedly. It says that nobody shall work over eight hours, but that there shall be relays of men kept to take the place of regular workmen if it be necessary to go beyond, except in cases of emergency the same men may be employed to go on. Practically it says, "You shall not work more than eight hours." I think that can not commend itself to those who are specially studying the labor question, as it is called, and I do not know anybody in the United States who does not study it.

You talk about legislating for the mass of the people. That is what we are doing, and nothing else; and we are of the mass of the people.

I object to the continued attempt to distinguish between ordinary people and laboring people in a country like the United States. There is scarcely a Senator here who has not been called a laboring man at some time in his life. I look around me and I can not of my own knowledge make three exceptions. I have just heard a most interesting story about a premium taken by one Senator for the amount of work he did in making harness when he was a young man, and so if you go around this room gentlemen will tell you, and will be proud to tell you, similar stories of what occurred to them when they were younger and in different circumstances. Talk about an attempt to distinguish us from the mass of the people and the laboring people! I know about the dirty work on a farm and half a dozen other kinds of honest labor; and I worked as long as I was told to do so.

I say those who claim to have made a special study of the labor question make a mistake in going too often to the Government to be regulated. The regulation has two sides to it. One of them is the regulation of the employer and the other is the regulation of the laborer. It is not absolutely certain that the Government will be always exactly right or exactly on one side of that question. You may think you can trust it, because it is a republic, but do not make a mistake and depart from the proper functions of the Government.

If I were working by the day or by the hour, I think I should feel indignant at being told by any statute that I should not work over eight hours. It is none of your business, legislators, to say that I shall not work over eight hours. I am the judge of my own health, and my own strength, and my own necessities. At the same time I coincide with the general policy of having a regulated time of labor under many and most circumstances.

But my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] has partially indicated the personal injustice under a law like that, and it must occur to every man. In a factory, or a navy-yard, or an arsenal, or whatever it may be, after the eight hours are done there may be a pressure for work for an hour or two hours more in case of any of the necessities that often arise.

The superintendent sends word around through the foreman or puts up a notice that two hours' work is desired in addition. Sir, if it is among New England mechanics, you will find nineteen-twentieths of them shaking hands with each other on the prospect of getting 25 per cent. more a day, and the probability is there will be 5, 10, 15, or 20 per cent. of them who will need it by reason of extra expenses in the family on account of illness and who will be glad to get it. I say you have no right to come in. It is none of your business to forbid them to do it, and they make a mistake in asking us to feed them with a spoon and hold a whip over them, as if they really did not know enough to make a bargain. I do not think they ask it. They do not talk that way to me. I employ some of them, and they do not talk to me in such a way as that.

I think the general principle of the bill is good, and I wish the Senator from Nevada would not complicate it with the amendment. I shall have to vote against the amendment of course, and then I shall be bothered to know whether it is not my solemn duty to vote against the whole measure if the amendment is carried.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, as a member of the Committee on Education and Labor, I dissented from the report of that committee in favor of this bill, and I propose very briefly to give the reasons of my dissent. In the first place, although the bill under consideration refers, or seemingly refers, the question to the courts, it in effect decides the whole matter itself.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator will allow me to say that I do not understand that the bill purports to refer any question to the courts further than the question of fact as to whether labor had been performed in excess of eight hours, and if so, by whom? That is all there is in the bill. If that is ascertained, I understand the case is made out.

Mr. GEORGE. Then we undertake to decide by the bill the question whether the United States is under a legal obligation to pay these parties an extra sum for their labor. We decide that, and we decide it without evidence upon which we shall act.

It is true the Committee on Education and Labor did hear some representatives of the laboring men who have been employed, but no hearing has been had on the part of the United States, that is, on the part of the great mass of the people of the United States by whose labor the taxes are put into the Treasury which are to be applied to the purpose of discharging this debt. They have not been heard, and the bill does not allow them to be heard. By the bill we take the case, decide it without evidence, and we refer it to the courts, as stated by the Senator from New Hampshire, merely for the purpose of ascertaining who worked and how many hours they worked in excess of the eight hours.

When we do that we do something right in the face of the statute under which this claim has been made. The statute of 1869, which I have before me, I will read to the Senate:

> Eight hours shall constitute a day's work for all laborers, workmen, and mechanics who may be employed by or on behalf of the Government of the United States.

In the case referred to by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] several days ago, and which has been referred to by other Senators, that statute underwent judicial determination, its meaning was settled, and the meaning was, as was read by the Senator from Massachusetts the other day, that it imposed no obligation upon the Government to pay to the laborer anything outside of the contract which he made with the Government officer. I will read part of the decision. The court said:

> The statute of the United States does not interfere with this principle.
> The principle of everybody making his own contract.
> It does not specify any sum which shall be paid for the labor of eight hours, nor that the price shall be more when the hours are greater or less when the hours are fewer. It is silent as to everything except directions to its own officers that eight hours shall constitute a day's work for a laborer.
> Second. The statute does not provide that the employer and the laborer may not agree with each other as to what time shall constitute a day's work.

That is the statute under which this right is claimed, a statute which does not prescribe, in the language of the Supreme Court of the United States, that more money or less shall be paid for eight hours than for any other number of hours. It makes no reference whatever to the compensation to be paid. It does not provide that the United States officer employing the laborer and the laborer may not of themselves agree with each other as to what time shall constitute a day's work.

That is the foundation of this bill. The statute as construed by the Supreme Court of the United States is the law of the land. By the law of the land, then, as settled beyond controversy or dispute, there is no obligation on the part of the United States to pay these men who have worked more than eight hours a day one single cent for the extra hours.

Then this proposition comes up: Are we out of the Treasury, the money contributed by all the people of the United States, and largely by the laborers of the United States, who were not benefited by the statute, and who will not be benefited by the statute if the bill passes, to take the money from them and give it to these laborers? It is a pure gift in law. There is not a scintilla of legal obligation, and it was so decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, to pay these men one single cent. It is a pure gift; it is a pure donation.

Mr. President, ought we to do that? That is the question. Ought the Congress of the United States to make a donation of several millions of dollars for three or four thousand laborers who happened to be in a more favorable condition than any other laborers in the United States in getting into the workshops of the United States? That is the question.

There is no money in the Treasury which has not been put there by taxation. Money does not grow in the Treasury of the United States. The United States engages in no business by which it makes money. It simply levies money in the shape of taxes from everybody in the United States and puts it into the Treasury. When we propose to pay any money out of the Treasury to anybody as a pure gift, we ought certainly to determine beforehand that the parties are in some meritorious condition which authorized them to be the beneficiaries of the Government. These men are laborers, but are they in a worse condition, are they not in an infinitely better condition, than their neighbors who at the same time in the same town or city were working for private parties?

Mr. President, I have some evidence upon that subject. When I was a member of the Committee on Education and Labor some three or four years ago this question came before that committee, and General Butler, of Massachusetts, appeared in behalf of the laborers.

He made a very long and interesting speech in behalf of the payment of these claims. Before I state what occurred, however, I must say to the Senate that we had a stenographer to take down General Butler's speech and the colloquies between him and the various members of the committee. His statement was taken down. It was written out. It was sent to General Butler for correction, and it has never been returned. Upon that subject I desire the Secretary to read a letter which I will send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the letter.

The Secretary read as follows:

> OFFICIAL REPORTER'S OFFICE, UNITED STATES SENATE,
> Washington, D. C., June 13, 1888.
> DEAR SIR: In response to your inquiry, I have to say that the manuscript of the statement of General B. F. Butler before the Senate Committee on Education and Labor some four years ago, on the matter of claims of Government employés for working more than eight hours per day, was left at his office in this city with Mr. Barrett, who attended to his business. Mr. Barrett promised to forward it to General Butler, and undoubtedly did so, as it was the general's request that the manuscript should be left with Mr. Barrett in his own absence. The manuscript has never been returned. Application was several times made to Mr. Barrett for its return, and finally General Butler was written to, but no answer was received from him.
> The original shorthand notes of General Butler's statement have long since been used up. It is our habit to use the paper on which notes are taken by writing long-hand on the opposite side so as to economize in the use of paper. I have, at your request, made frequent search for those notes during the past three years, and am satisfied that they were long since disposed of in the manner stated.
> Yours, truly,
> D. F. MURPHY.
> Hon. J. Z. GEORGE, United States Senate.

Mr. GEORGE. I have had that letter read, not for the purpose of convicting General Butler of a willful suppression of the statement which he made before the committee—I disclaim any purpose of that sort—but to show that I have made every effort in my power to procure that statement as he made it, and as a justification to me for making a statement of what he said, as I remember it. I have done all I could to get the paper. I have applied over and over again, as Mr. Murphy says, for the original draught as written out, and then afterwards, when I learned that the paper was not returned by General Butler, I asked to have the paper reproduced from the stenographic notes, and you have the Reporter's answer.

I asked General Butler at the close of his speech, or very near the close of it, if it was not a fact well known to him that the laborers on the Government works had an exceptionally desirable position, much more so than those engaged in private establishments in the same community. His answer was substantially this: "You are correct. It is one of the great troubles and annoyances of a member of Congress, having one of these Government workshops in his district, to provide places in those workshops for his friends." That was the statement he made. So it appears that these laborers who were in the Government workshops had exceptionally good positions—positions that were sought for, positions which when received were regarded as advantages over their fellow-workmen in the same community engaged in the same class of work.

That is the position which these laborers now occupy. I do not object to their occupying as good a position as they can get. I am glad whenever a laborer can get a position which enables him to do better than he otherwise would; but when this class of men thus favored above their fellow-laborers in getting choice positions, getting them by favor of politicians and members of Congress, have voluntarily made contracts with the Government which are not onerous to them, which are not in violation of any law of Congress, as the Supreme Court decided in the case to which I called the Senate's attention—I say under all these circumstances when they come here and ask for a mere donation out of the Treasury, I inquire, Shall I give it to them? And on this point I want to quote General Butler again in that interview.

It is not a question of fact, but a question of political economy on which the general and I happened to agree.

I asked him if it was not a fact that in the main the taxes paid into the Treasury were paid by the labor of the country, and he, agreeing with me on that point in political economy, answered very properly, "yes." I then asked him, as I ask the Senate, where is the propriety, where is the justice of taxing the great mass of the laboring people of this country in order that the condition of those of their fellows, which without this donation is much better than theirs, should be made better still?

I put this to the Senate for their calm consideration, and whether you agree with General Butler and myself upon the point in political economy that taxes are paid almost uniformly and universally by the labor of this country, you must admit that under our taxing system they are very largely paid by them. I understand there are three or four thousand of these favored laborers.

Mr. BLAIR. Between 14,000 and 15,000.

Mr. GEORGE. Very well; there are between 14,000 and 15,000 favored employés of the Government, men who have got the plums, men who have got the desirable positions by the favor of politicians and members of Congress, men who are paid more according to their labor than the rest of the laborers of the country; 14,000 or 15,000 of them, without a single scintilla of legal right—because that has been disposed of by the Supreme Court of the United States—come in here and ask us to tax all the rest of the laborers of the country in order, not that they shall get what they contracted to get, not that they have not got what every other laborer working with them got, a fair, an honest, and a liberal compensation for their labor, but that their advantages over their fellow laborers throughout this country should be more and more largely increased. You may talk about it as you please, but it comes down to that point at last. You can not evade it by any sort of argument.

Mr. President, what is this country without its laborers, and who are they? Sir, they are everywhere, all over this land. They are not only engaged in the Government workshops by the favor of the member of Congress from that district, but by stern necessity they are everywhere all over this land, in the mines, in the factories, in the workshops, in the fields, and what are those men getting? Go to the South, go to my own country, go to a class of people there who seem to have in some way or other very much the attention and love of a great many members of this body, and see how they are paid.

I will tell Senators somewhat of the gain of a laborer in the South in the fields, for I happen to know. I am not telling about wages. Agricultural wages in the State in which I live are rarely ever paid. Most farmers and planters who have paid wages for agricultural labor had to go through the bankruptcy court, so that now the system is almost universal in the State of Mississippi (and I think that to be a fair sample of the other cotton-growing States) that colored laborers not more than once in ten or twenty times are ever hired for wages to work on a farm; they work either for shares or for rent.

I want to tell Senators what a Southern laborer will gain in the course of a year by working his own land, paying no rent. A colored man working in the cotton-fields, if he has a wife and two or three little children who can help him at the picking-time, will raise five bales of cotton on very good land, and will probably have corn enough to use. He will work, as we say down there, thirteen months in the year, because they commence in January and continue to the following January with the crop of the preceding year. So the people have a way of saying down there, and it expresses the idea pretty well, that to make a cotton crop and gather it and get it to market takes thirteen months. If the cotton is cleanly gathered and well ginned it will bring at the nearest market-place, at which they always sell it, about $40 per bale, making $200 for the laborer with the aid of his wife and children, whom I will put in at about one-third of a hand altogether, because they do not work a great deal.

If he hires to the proprietor of a plantation and feeds himself he will not get $175 a year, and the man who pays, if he hires many of them, goes into the bankruptcy court.

Now, what does such a laborer get? Out of that he has to live. He must have a mule as capital, or he has to rent a mule, because he can not cultivate and raise the five bales of cotton without an animal of some sort to plow. He has to pay for the ginning of his cotton, which will cost him $3.50 a bale. He has to pay for the hauling of it to market, which will cost him something, unless he has a wagon and mule of his own. I am speaking now of the man who has only his own mule and does his own labor. At the end of the year, if he is economical, if he has not spent any money at the grocery or saloon, he finds that he has lived hard and has no money. That man is certainly entitled somewhat to the consideration of the Government.

The same thing will apply to white men, because there are many white men in the South engaged in raising cotton in the same way as the man I have just described. About the only difference is that there are fewer white men who have to pay rent on the land than there are colored men.

Mr. BLAIR. I should like to ask the Senator a question for information. This is exceedingly interesting and valuable. Do I understand him to say that probably as many white men as colored men work in the field raising cotton?

Mr. GEORGE. Oh, no; but only as an old Indian chief said down there when running for the senate of the State of Mississippi. He was a Whig and he was telling the people there that he had befriended more poor Democrats than he had poor Whigs, for the reason that there were more poor Democrats than there were poor Whigs. So, for the reason that there are more colored people in Mississippi than whites, there are more colored people engaged in raising cotton.

Mr. BLAIR. I referred to the whole cotton-growing country. Of course the Middle States do not grow cotton.

Mr. GEORGE. I do not know; I am speaking of Mississippi. Of course there are more colored laborers, especially in the black belts. Our State of Mississippi is divided into several belts, one where it is all black, another where it is nearly all white, another where it is divided more evenly between the two races. I submit to Senators, what is the justice of taxing that class of men in order that you may make a donation, because that is all it is?

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator has quoted General Butler to prove some abstract theory that labor pays the taxation, but I should like to have him point out how the colored man raising his five bales of cotton a year pays the wages of these Government laborers.

Mr. GEORGE. He pays his taxes to the Government. Is he not taxed on his hat? Is he not taxed on his shoes? Is he not taxed on his coat? Is he not taxed on everything he gets and wears?

Mr. BLAIR. Not on a thing the Senator has mentioned.

Mr. GEORGE. Then give it to them without taxation on account of the tariff.

Mr. BLAIR. He has to pay something for them, but he gets them a great deal cheaper than he would under any other tariff than our own.

Mr. GEORGE. It is because they are taxed. But I do not want to go into a discussion of the tariff in the little speech I am making here.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator raised the question as to the propriety of taxing the poor colored men in Mississippi.

Mr. GEORGE. I can tell you in short that labor is taxed in this country. Everything produced in this country is produced by labor. Nothing is produced by the Government. Nothing is produced by the Senator from New Hampshire and the Senator from Mississippi now addressing you.

Mr. BLAIR. I beg the Senator's pardon. When we have a protective tariff we produce more cheaply.

Mr. GEORGE. We produce nothing; we toil not, neither do we spin; and yet, like the lilies of the field, Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of us. I set it down as an indisputable fact in political economy that as all production comes from labor, all that is paid, not only of taxes, but of the follies and frivolities and luxuries of the rich, comes from labor.

Mr. BLAIR. A great proportion of the labor is done more and more by machinery.

Mr. GEORGE. How much would machinery be worth if you did not have a man to attend to it? A laborer made the machine, a laborer runs the machine, a laborer furnishes the coal and the steam by which the machinery is propelled.

Mr. BLAIR. I am exceedingly adverse to raising any discussion——

Mr. GEORGE. Do not let us go into the tariff now.

Mr. BLAIR. No Senator is more anxious than I am for action on this bill, but the argument the Senator from Mississippi is making all the way through is an argument against the eight-hour law itself. If the Government employé is any better off than any other employé in like work in the vicinity, it is because of the eight-hour law he works for a less period of time. Of course the position is more desirable, but the law exists, and the point is, there being such a law and all the questions such as the Senator now discusses being settled so far as this case is concerned by the enactment of the law, ought these men who have been obliged to work more than that time be paid for the extra time?

Mr. GEORGE. They have not been obliged to work.

Mr. BLAIR. They have done the work.

Mr. GEORGE. They did it because they wanted to do it. There is no slavery in this country. I think that was abolished some years ago, and I have understood that since that time, under the beneficent action of a protective tariff, there was more employment for laborers who desire to be hired than ever before.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not think slavery is abolished in this country. Theoretically it is abolished, but the consequences of slavery are just what the Senator has been depicting, that the laborer, by reason of the inferior condition to which he was reduced by force of a pre-existing state of things during the last quarter of a century, has not been brought out of those conditions in full as yet.

Mr. GEORGE. I told you that the white man was in the same condition down there.

Mr. BLAIR. The white man was affected by the condition of slavery as well as the colored man. When was the time that the white man at the South received anything like the wages that the white man at the North received?

Mr. GEORGE. Of course he was affected; but still, if these men actually get but that much, what is the justice of taxing them more to pay somebody else?

Mr. BLAIR. But the Senator——

Mr. GEORGE. I decline to be interrupted.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator——

Mr. GEORGE. I decline to be further interrupted by the Senator.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator is talking——

Mr. GEORGE. I decline to be further interrupted. I want to get through, and then you may reply to what I say.

Mr. BLAIR. Then I do not see how you can say any more.

Mr. GEORGE. I decline to be further interrupted, because I want to get through with what I have to say. You see how that is.

I have some other interesting testimony here to read. The Senator from New Hampshire was a little mistaken yesterday in supposing that the Committee on Education and Labor had uniformly reported in favor of this matter. I send a report to the Clerk's desk made by General Burnside May 24, 1878, on this subject. I shall also read the resolution upon which the report was made. Let the Secretary read the report, and then on the third page read the statement of the laborers in Boston, Mass.

The Secretary read as follows:

The Committee on Education and Labor, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. Res. 176) to provide for the enforcement of the eight-hour law, have to report:

That, after mature consideration, recommendation is made that the Senate non-concur in the action of the House.

Without going into an argument as to the justice and propriety of the eight-hour law now upon the statute-books, and touching only the workingmen in Government employ, your committee are of the opinion that the law explains itself most distinctly. It means that Government labor shall be confined to eight hours each day, but has no reference whatever to the compensation for such labor. This opinion is fortified by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, opinion delivered by Justice Swayne, May 6, 1878, United States vs. Driscoll.

It is clear to your committee that the Government should employ its workingmen at the same rate as is paid for like labor outside of Government establishments in the same locality. A system under which it would pay higher wages than private concerns pay for like work would result in establishing favoritism in labor which would very naturally be offensive to all men outside Government employ, and would ultimately lead to the abandonment of the Government workshops.

It is well known that in these workshops men are often employed upon the recommendation of members of Congress, not always with reference to their qualifications.

The system of itself is sufficiently distasteful to the workingmen outside of the Government establishments, and any regulation or law giving to these Government employés the same wages for eight hours' work which the same class of workmen outside get for ten hours' work would make it still more distasteful. Your committee believe that the mass of workingmen of the country are not in sympathy with the spirit of this resolution.

Accompanying this report is the petition from some of the workingmen of Boston, which was referred to your committee for their consideration. Your committee ask to be relieved from further consideration of the same.

The following is a copy of the decision of the Supreme Court referred to above:

"To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States assembled at Washington:

"The undersigned are mechanics of Boston and vicinity, and respectfully represent that they have seen presented in the House of Representatives a resolution to enforce what is known as the eight-hour law—that is, to pay laborers employed on Government works as much pay for eight hours' labor as the same class of men can get for ten hours' work elsewhere. We conceive this to be a great outrage to those of us mechanics who, from political or other reasons, have never been able to get employed in the navy-yard or other public works. The extra pay these few men get comes out of us in the way of taxes on the great body of the industry of the country. Not one in ten thousand of the mechanics or laborers of the country can be employed on Government works, and those that get this employment are the henchmen of the members of Congress, for whose election they work, as every one familar with the subject knows. They are not among the thriving laborers of the country.

"When it is seen that in all agricultural and farming occupations there can, from the necessity of the case, be no such thing as a regulation or limitation of the hours of labor, and that this department of industry requires more labor than all the other departments together, and that the burden of taxation falls more heavily on this interest than any other, it seems strange than any one fit to go to Congress should be demagogue enough to advocate paying the political laborers who get into the navy-yards and post-offices 20 per cent. more pay than better mechanics elsewhere can get. We respectfully pray that the eight-hour law be repealed, or so enforced as that men who get on Government work shall not be paid any more than others can get, or, if they can, that their extra pay shall come out of the salary of the member of Congress who got them the work.

"WM. M. MERRILL.
"A. F. HEATH.
"THOS. R. HARRIMAN.
"AUSTIN P. CARTER.
"S. P. HALL.
"HORACE A. MILLS.

"P. S.—We believe every honest mechanic would sign if we had the time to present this to him."

Mr. GEORGE. That paper appended to the report was brought in by the Committee on Education and Labor at that time. Here is the joint resolution which the committee considered which passed the House of Representatives May 9, 1878:

That according to the true intent and meaning of the act of Congress approved June 25, 1868, entitled "An act constituting eight hours a legal day's work for all laborers, workmen, and mechanics employed by or on behalf of the Government of the United States," eight hours constitute a day's work for all such laborers, workmen, and mechanics; and while said act remains upon the statute-book no reduction shall be made in the wages paid by the Government, by the day, to such laborers, workmen, and mechanics on account of the reduction of the hours of labor; and that all heads of Departments, officers, and agents of the Government are hereby directed to enforce said law as long as the same is unrepealed.

That was the resolution which the Committee on Education and Labor had before them and upon which they made their report.

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator allow me to make an interruption, not to get into the discussion, which I see goes too far, but to correct his statement as to my inaccuracy? What I said was that this bill providing for the payment of arrears had been pending during three Congresses, with, so far as I know, favorable reports in each House during each Congress. That was, as the Senator will observe, a joint resolution declaratory of the true meaning of the act, and I did not take it into consideration. It was passed by the House and disapproved by the Senate in the year 1878.

Mr. GEORGE. I think the Senator from New Hampshire is correct. It was not a bill to pay the laborers, but a joint resolution declaratory of the meaning of the act. On that committee were the following gentlemen, who all joined in the report: Mr. Burnside, chairman, Mr. Patterson, Mr. MORRILL, Mr. Bruce, Mr. Sharon, Mr. Gordon, Mr. Maxey, Mr. Bailey, and Mr. Lamar. A debate grew up on that report, and I desire to read some extracts from it, especially from the speeches of Mr. Burnside and the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] who I see is not present. Mr. Burnside said:

I should be glad to have the Senator refer to it.

That is, the law—

I can find no such law on the statute-book. That the Government of the United States shall pay men for eight hours' work the same amount of money that is paid by private establishments outside for ten hours' work is simply absurd. It is not honest and right. It is unjust to the other workmen of the United States. The main body of workingmen in the United States do not want any such measure as this passed. They do not want a privileged class of workmen in the Government workshops. No man in this Congress is more interested in the welfare of the workingman than I am; I give that as much thought almost as I do any other subject. There is nothing within reason that I can be called upon to do to relieve the wants of the workingmen of this country that I will not do; but I will not do an unjust act. I will not do a thing that is unjust to the workingmen of the United States as a body for the benefit of two or three thousand employés of the Government of the United States. The resolution on its face is absurd and unjust and wrong.

That is what General Burnside said upon it. Now, I will read what the venerable Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] said.

Mr. VANCE. Will the Senator give me the date of that speech?

Mr. GEORGE. It was in 1878.

Mr. VANCE. There was no Presidential election pending then?

Mr. GEORGE. No, sir; no Presidential election was pending. June 17 this matter came up again, and I will read an extract from the speech of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL.] He said:

I think it is decidedly hostile to the interests of the workingman himself; it undermines his independence; it is saying that some legislative power may regulate the number of hours which he should work—

Very much like the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] talked a little while ago—when it ought to be left to the stern, self-independence of every man to make his own bargain and his own contract as to how he will work, when and where, and how long.

Here is what the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] said June 12, 1878:

Mr. President, I desire to say a word or so on this subject, and if I had time and the Senate had time I think I could convince any workingman that this law was adverse to his interests. I am not sure that I can convince the Senate.

* * * * * * *

Now, Mr. President, I think that it is wrong for us to create fat places for a few of our people and make all the rest who contribute to their support discontented. Take the farmers and mechanics of my own State, or of any other State, and it will be found that they work more than twelve hours upon the average; and yet these men are called upon to work and contribute for the support of the men who only are to work eight hours.

Again he said:

The whole of my sympathies are altogether in favor of the laboring men; I belong to that class myself; but I do not like to have them deceived, humbugged I would say if it were a proper word, by any such measure as this. I do not believe it is in their interest. Our workingmen are in an entirely different position from the workingmen of Europe. They are not dependent; they can go where they please all over this country and find employment either in agriculture, manufactures, mining, or in the mechanic arts. They have had the benefit of schools and know how to take care of themselves. They are competent to make their own bargains.

When the Senator from Vermont was saying what these workmen could do, that they could go all over the country and get work where they were employed, I am sorry he could not say they could all get work in the Government shops at $2.50 or $3.50 a day and work only eight hours a day. I am sorry he was compelled to admit that there were only a few who could get this privilege, and that the great body of the workmen of this country were compelled to work longer hours in order to contribute to those who were more favored than they. I will read another extract from the speech of the Senator from Vermont. He said:

Under the law as it is now administered, while eight hours are prescribed for a day's work, we pay in proportion to what is paid outside for similar work. Is not that just? Is any one in favor of buying anything that the United States shall require for its use, ship-timber, iron, or anything else, and paying 20 per cent. more than anybody else pays. Is it not calculated to excite discontent over the whole country, and to make men over-anxious to get Government employment? I had a letter this very morning urging me to assist a man to get into one of these navy-yards. I do not think that it is right and proper that we should have these fat places secured—by political influence and entirely against the interests of all the millions of other workingmen, solely for the benefit of three or four thousand men who are employed by Government.

That was the language of the venerable Senator from Vermont upon that subject.

Now, Mr. President, I have but very little further to say. I have put the facts before the Senate, and the Senate must perceive that it is but a proposition to make those who are less favored than these men in the Government shops contribute to make them even more favored than they were before, and that is all there is in it. If it were a proposition for the benefit and the welfare of the great mass of the laboring people of this country, and I could see it in that way, it would afford me the greatest pleasure to vote for it; but as it is a proposition simply to tax the underpaid laborers of this country, who are working longer hours in order to contribute to the favored few, who, as the Senator from Vermont said, secured their places by political influence, I am opposed to it.

Mr. DAWES. I shall detain the Senate but a moment. I would not interfere with the conduct of this bill by the committee to whom it was committed, being in entire harmony with the object the committee have in view, were it not for the fact that the bill discloses, and the discussion also discloses, that there are a variety of circumstances under which employés of the Government have been engaged to work, somewhat with the view of avoiding this very law.

This bill has been so drawn as to secure compensation for those who were employed in the navy-yards, and not, I suppose, with the view to exclude anybody else, but because those who were employed in the navy-yards had more to do with presenting it, and therefore the conditions under which they worked have been brought more clearly before the committee than those of any others.

The armorers of the country have had no voice in shaping this bill. I represented the district in which the Springfield Armory is located for many years in the House of Representatives and during the time that this law was enacted, and I have had personal knowledge of the manner in which the armorers have struggled with this law; and it is only because I desire to have this bill so worded in its phraseology as that they shall derive benefit from it that I venture to interfere at all in this discussion.

After the eight-hour law was passed it was submitted to three different Attorneys-General for their opinion. Two of them gave the opinion that the law had no reference to compensation, but only to the number of hours that each employé should be engaged in work for the Government. Thereupon President Grant issued the proclamation which I have before me and which I will read:

Whereas the act of Congress approved June 25, 1868, constituted on and after that date eight hours a day's work for all laborers, workmen, and mechanics employed by or on behalf of the Government of the United States and repealed all acts or parts of acts inconsistent therewith:

Now, therefore, I, Ulysses S. Grant, President of the United States, do hereby direct that from and after this date no reduction shall be made in the wages paid by the Government by the day to such laborers, workmen, and mechanics on account of such reduction of the hours of labor.

In testimony whereof I have hereto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington, this 19th day of May, in the year of our Lord 1869, and of the Independence of the United States the ninety-third.

U. S. GRANT.

By the President:
HAMILTON FISH,
Secretary of State.

Thereupon the Secretary of War addressed a letter to another Attorney-General, asking him what was the condition of the United States after that proclamation. I have here the answer of Attorney-General Akerman to that inquiry:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, May 31, 1871.

SIR: Your letter of the 23d instant requests my opinion as to the interpretation to be placed upon the President's proclamation of May 19, 1869, directing that no reduction shall be made from and after that date in the per diem wages paid to laborers, workmen, and mechanics, on account of reduction of the number of working hours consequent upon the act of June 25, 1868, and whether or not workmen are entitled to extra compensation for extra working hours (over eight) from the passage of the act to the date of the President's proclamation.

The act of June 25, 1868 (15 U. S. Stat., p. 77) declared that "eight hours shall constitute a day's work for all laborers, workmen, and mechanics now employed or who may be hereafter employed by or on behalf of the Government of the United States."

As this act was construed by Attorney-General Evarts (12 Opinions, page 530) and by Attorney-General Hoar in an unpublished opinion of April 20, 1869, it did not relate to compensation, but only to the hours of labor, and the compensation was left to be regulated upon the principles in force at the time of its passage. The President's proclamation of May 19, 1869, directed that from and after that date no reduction should be made in wages on account of the reduction wrought by that act in the hours of labor. The proclamation, by its terms, is to have effect from and after its date.

Persons serving the Government as laborers, workmen, and mechanics after that date received from that proclamation a notice that the statutory reduction of the hours of labor would not reduce their pay; and consequently this expectation entered into their contracts with the Government for labor. Previously to that proclamation there was no statutory or Executive announcement that they would receive the wages of a day of ten hours for working eight hours. They served the Government without any authorized expectation of receiving more than the customary wages, and nothing more is justly due to them. The subject of wages is a matter of contract, either expressed or implied, and while the Government should most scrupulously keep its faith by paying to persons in its service all that it engages to pay, it is under no obligation to pay more for the past because it has agreed to pay more for the future.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. T. AKERMAN, Attorney-General.

Hon. WILLIAM W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War.

Thereupon the War Department resorted to another device by which to evade this law after the opinion of the Attorney-General was to the effect that the proclamation held out the promise that the men were to be paid by the hour at the rate of eight hours a day. It was a promise on the part of the Government, in the opinion of the Attorney-General, that they should have a full day's compensation for eight hours' labor. Then the War Department resorted to this method at the armories: They made every man who wanted to work for the Government sign this agreement:

We, the undersigned, employed at the National Armory, Springfield, Mass., on behalf of the United States, hereby agree to work ten hours each calendar day, or at the rate thereof, for the sums set opposite our respective names. This contract is made in conformity to General Orders No. 53, Headquarters of the Army, Adjutant-General's Office, June 1, 1887, and can be terminated at the pleasure of the United States or the subscribing party.

Under that they had this alternative, either not to work at all or to work under that agreement. They all worked under that agreement. Then there came another device, and that was that certain of them should work by the piece, and if a man did so many pieces during a day it was to be considered a full day's work, but he was to continue at work as long as the shop was running each day. Another class of the men were required to work by the task; that is, a man had to do a certain thing for a day's work.

Neither of these classes of employés of the Government is described in the bill that the committee has reported, and reasonably enough, because they were not called to the attention of the committee. I desire therefore to modify the Senator's bill so that it will bring in these two classes of laborers, those who worked by the piece and those who worked by the task, and I want to make sure that they will not be tripped up by this agreement. If the Senator from Mississippi will send me back the book I will show him why that was necessary.

Mr. GEORGE. The Ninety-fourth United States Reports?

Mr. DAWES. Yes. Here was a case where a man was told "You have been to work for ten hours at such a rate. Now, if you continue to work you must work at the same rate." If the Senator from New Hampshire bases his bill upon the conclusion he came to on reading this, I am afraid he will not get anything for the navy-yards. He thought that the reason why this man was tripped up was merely because he had accepted that pay. But this opinion, as read in full just now by the Senator from Mississippi, goes a good deal farther. It says that this act is only directory.

1. The act of Congress of June 25, 1868 (15 Stat., 77), declaring that eight hours shall constitute a day's work for all laborers, workmen, and mechanics employed by or on behalf of the Government of the United States, is in the nature of a direction by the Government to its agents.

2. It is not a contract between the Government and its laborers that eight hours shall constitute a day's work. It neither prevents the Government from making agreements with them by which their labor may be more or less than eight hours a day nor does it prescribe the amount of compensation for that or any other number of hours' labor.

That is this case.

3. Where, therefore, a laborer, in the habit of working for the Government twelve hours a day for $2.50 a day, is informed by the proper authority that if he remains in the service at that compensation he must continue to work twelve hours a day, and he does so continue and is paid accordingly, he can not afterwards recover for the additional time over eight hours as a day's labor.

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DAWES. Certainly.

Mr. BLAIR. What competent authority is there to give the laborer this information?

Mr. DAWES. I am not justifying this.

Mr. BLAIR. But what authority was there to discharge the man because he was not to work over eight hours a day? That is the point I made. Therefore the decision rests upon the fact, and it is the decisive fact, that there was an agreement to refer, under which there was an award, and the man accepted the award, and so it was all over.

Mr. DAWES. I suppose there was a proper authority. That is all I can say about that; and I do not think that alters the law.

Now, the court say:

In the case before us the claimant continued his work after understanding that eight hours would not be accepted as a day's labor, but that he must work twelve hours, as he had done before. He received his pay of $2.50 a day for the work of twelve hours a day as a calendar day's work during the period in question without protest or objection.

That is what every one of these men has done.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator is mistaken; none of them did it without protest.

Mr. DAWES. Well, at any rate, the decision does not turn on the question of protest. At that time the claimant's contract was a voluntary and reasonable one, by which he must now be bound.

Now, therefore, in order to make the description of "laborer" in the bill apply to the whole of the armory laborers, and in order to "knock out," if I may use that homely expression, this device of making a laborer agree beforehand, or not work, that he shall not have what the law and the proclamation of the President said he should have, I wish the Senator would just take this substitute, which I ask the Secretary to read in the place of his provision.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SECTION 1. That whoever, as a laborer, workman, or mechanic, has been employed by or on behalf of the Government of the United States since the 21st day of June, 1868, the date of the act constituting eight hours a day's work, shall be paid for each eight hours he has been employed as for a full day's work, whether engaged at a price per day or upon piecework or task-work, without any reduction of pay on account of the reduction of the hours of labor, any agreement between the United States and any such laborer, workman, or mechanic touching such compensation, imposed as a condition, to the contrary notwithstanding; and the proper accounting officers are hereby directed to readjust the accounts of all such laborers, workmen, or mechanics, and pay the same in conformity with the provisions of this act; and a sufficient sum of money for that purpose is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 2. If any claim under the provisions of this act shall be rejected by the said proper accounting officers, the claimant is hereby authorized at any time within one year after such rejection to commence proceedings to recover the same in the Court of Claims, and the judgment in favor of such claim, if any, shall be paid out of the appropriation aforesaid.

Mr. DAWES. The difference between this and the bill the Senator reported is just this: It follows the language of his bill, and then adds:

Whether engaged by the day or in piece or task work, any agreement touching such compensation, imposed as a condition, to the contrary notwithstanding.

Then it directs the accounting officers to pay according to that method, and appropriates money for that purpose.

Then comes the second section, which gives every one that is rejected by the accounting officers a right to go to the Court of Claims and enforce his claim. It opens the door for every one that the accounting officers of the Treasury shall determine is entitled to it, and then gives every one that is rejected a right to go to the Court of Claims. That is the difference between this and the plan proposed by the Senator. If the plan proposed by the Senator is adopted all this large class of armorers will be counted out, for the reasons I have suggested.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator yield for a moment so that I may modify my amendment?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I yield for a moment for that purpose.

Mr. HOAR. I do not think that is altogether fair.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I withdraw my motion altogether.

Mr. STEWART. I am now entitled to the floor to modify my amendment. The Senator from Vermont yielded to me for that purpose. After consultation with Senators I have modified my amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The modification of the amendment of the Senator from Nevada will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That it shall be unlawful for any officer or agent of the United States to make any contract with any laborer, workman, artisan, or mechanic to perform more than eight hours' labor in any one day: Provided, That where the laborers, workmen, artisans, or mechanics in the employ of the United States are desirous to work extra time or are unable to perform the necessary labor in eight hours to meet the necessities of the case it shall not be unlawful to make special contracts with the laborers, workmen, artisans, or mechanics so employed to perform additional hours of labor and to receive a corresponding additional compensation. Any officer or agent of the United States who shall willfully violate the provisions of this section shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof be fined in any sum not exceeding $500. This section shall have no application to persons on board of vessels navigating the waters of the United States or the high seas.

Mr. COCKRELL. Pending that, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask unanimous consent to remind the Senate that if we do not conclude the consideration of this bill at this time, it will, as I am informed by the chairman of the committee of the other House, probably prevent its consideration during the present session of that House. I have nothing more to say.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the motion of the Senator from Missouri that the Senate do now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 16, noes 16.

Mr. HOAR. No quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not agreed to, although no quorum has voted.

Mr. STEWART. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada asks for the yeas and nays.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is no quorum voting.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By consent the vote may be ordered to be taken by yeas and nays, so as to avoid the calling of the roll to show whether a quorum be present.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the Chair will put the question on ordering the yeas and nays.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask unanimous consent to inquire whether there was any understanding that this bill should be disposed of to-day? If there was, I shall be bound to stand by it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As the Chair understands, there was not.

Mr. BLAIR. There was no understanding. There was simply the frequently announced state of affairs that in all human probability this bill can not be considered by the other House at this session unless we send it to them to-day. I have stated that. To go into executive session now would be probably to defeat it.

Mr. HOAR. I understood, for one, not that the Senate made an understanding which bound any Senator's honor, but that there was general consent that the Senator from New Hampshire gave up pressing his bill yesterday when he, I think, was entitled to proceed, stating that he was desirous to go on with it to-day for the reason that this was the last day when a vote upon it would do any good. Everybody acquiesced in that, and the statement was made in regard to other business which I will not now repeat that it was proposed to take up to-day. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], who had the floor on the fisheries treaty this morning, stated, as I am informed, that he refrained from using his right to the floor to-day.

Mr. VEST. Because he was not able to proceed.

Mr. COCKRELL. Because he was not able, as we understood on this side of the Chamber.

Mr. TELLER. I will say that I stated last night in executive session (if I may be allowed to state it, as it was about a public matter) that I was not well, and that it was doubtful whether I ought to go on to-day, and that I would willingly give way for this bill. I myself supposed this bill, as the Senator from Massachusetts has said, was to be closed.

Mr. HOAR. I may be permitted to say that we have assigned to the honorable Senator from New Hampshire the chairmanship of this committee, and so the leadership of the Senate on this question, and it does seem to me that courtesy to that Senator, without any reference to the merits of the measure, requires us to give him an opportunity to bring the matter to a vote in the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. I desire to say that for myself, and as I believe for the Senators who are around me here, it was the farthest thing possible from our view that there was any agreement or understanding, direct or indirect, in any shape, manner, or form, that this bill should be taken up and disposed of to-day. The Senator from Texas, who sits by me, and myself discussed it and some one asked permission, and that request was withdrawn simply because it would not be agreed to. As the Senator from New Hampshire has stated, he gave his statement about it and announced his anxiety to press the bill, but there was no unanimous consent and no understanding and no agreement direct or indirect that this bill or any other measure should be determined to-day. In fact there was more notice given that another matter would be moved—the matter which I have moved now—that the Senate would proceed to the consideration of executive business—than there was that this bill should be disposed of.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This debate proceeds by unanimous consent. Is there objection?

Mr. VOORHEES. My understanding was that this bill, if it was to have the right of way to-day, was to proceed until closed. That was my understanding, without pretending to say that it was the general understanding of the Senate. That understanding will govern my vote as far as going into executive session is concerned.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask unanimous consent to suggest to the Senator from Missouri that we might as well finish this day with this bill and go into executive session early to-morrow, and dispose of the executive business when we may, and let the Senator from New Hampshire go on now with his bill. I say this with the more freedom because as to the first part of the bill, relating to the claims, it is a matter of great doubt in my mind as to whether it should be passed, and as to the second part, I think it is a wrong and almost a crime against the workingman himself. So it is not on account of any zeal for my friend's bill that I speak, but I think that on the whole we had better finish it to-day, and I hope my friend from Missouri will withdraw his motion. It will save time.

Mr. HEARST. It was my understanding clearly that the Senator from New Hampshire gave way purposely to get his bill up to-day, and that he should have the floor until the bill should pass.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to know how such an agreement as that was made. The Senator on my left [Mr. COKE] was here as well as myself listening to every word that was said, and there was no pretense of anything of that kind.

Now, I propose to withdraw this motion for the time being, but not with any understanding that this bill is to be disposed of this evening. It has no more right of way than anything else. I do not propose to subordinate the business of the Senate to this bill or to individual zeal.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is embarrassed by the fact that the absence of a quorum was disclosed by the state of the vote just taken.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is evidently a quorum here now. I ask unanimous consent that the Chair count the Senate again, so as to ascertain that there is a quorum here, as there evidently is, I think. That will save time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (after counting the Senators present). There is not a quorum present in the Chamber.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then we shall have to call the roll.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The roll of the Senate will be called.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bate,	Colquitt,	Hawley,	Reagan,
Beck,	Cullom,	Hearst,	Sabin,
Berry,	Davis,	Hoar,	Spooner,
Blair,	Dawes,	Ingalls,	Stewart,
Blodgett,	Dolph,	Kenna,	Stockbridge,
Bowen,	Edmunds,	McPherson,	Teller,
Brown,	Farwell,	Manderson,	Turpie,
Call,	Faulkner,	Mitchell,	Vance,
Cameron,	Frye,	Palmer,	Voorhees,
Chace,	George,	Pasco,	Wilson of Iowa,
Chandler,	Gibson,	Payne,	Wilson of Md.
Cockrell,	Hale,	Platt,
Coke,	Hampton,	Pugh,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty Senators have answered to their names. A quorum being present, the question recurs on the amendment proposed to the pending bill by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART]. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. STEWART. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DAWES (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY]. I do not know how he would vote if he were present. I would vote "yea" if he were present.

Mr. MANDERSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN].

Mr. MITCHELL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES]. If he were here I should vote "yea."

Mr. PAYNE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES] on political questions. I do not know whether this is a political question or not. I inquire of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] how his colleague would vote on this question.

Mr. STEWART. I think my colleague, if present, would vote "yea."

Mr. PAYNE. If the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES] were present, I should vote "nay," but not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. PLATT (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM].

Mr. SPOONER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WALTHALL]. I do not see him in the Chamber, and therefore I withhold my vote.

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 15, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—15.

Blair,	Davis,	Palmer,	Teller,
Bowen,	Dolph,	Sabin,	Turpie,
Chace,	Farwell,	Stewart,	Voorhees.
Chandler,	Frye,	Stockbridge,

NAYS—29.

Bate,	Cockrell,	Hawley,	Sawyer,
Beck,	Coke,	Hearst,	Vance,
Berry,	Colquitt,	Hoar,	Vest,
Blodgett,	Cullom,	Kenna,	Wilson of Iowa.
Brown,	Faulkner,	McPherson,	Wilson of Md.
Butler,	George,	Pasco,
Call,	Gibson,	Pugh,
Cameron,	Hampton,	Reagan,

ABSENT—32.

Aldrich,	Gorman,	Manderson,	Quay,
Allison,	Gray,	Mitchell,	Ransom,
Blackburn,	Hale,	Morgan,	Riddleberger,
Daniel,	Harris,	Morrill,	Saulsbury,

Edmunds,	Ingalls,	Payne,	Spooner,
Eustis,	Jones of Arkansas,	Platt,	Stanford,
Evarts,	Jones of Nevada,	Plumb,	Walthall.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DAWES. I ask the Senator from New Hampshire if he will accept the amendment I sent up.

Mr. BLAIR. The amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts changes the whole basis and plan of the bill, and I do not see how, in justice to the measure, I can consent to accept it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported by the Clerk.

Mr. DAWES. If the Clerk will send the amendment to me I will explain it to the Senator. I ask him to accept as an amendment——

Mr. BLAIR. What I have given to the Senator is something that I wish to add to the first section of the pending bill.

Mr. DAWES. I ask the Senator to accept this: To insert after the words "full day's work," in the eighth line, the words:

Whether engaged at a price per day, or upon piece-work, or task-work.

That is the description in which the armorers would come.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 8, after the words "full day's work," it is proposed to insert "whether engaged at a price per day, or upon piece-work, or task-work."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. Now I ask the Senate to insert immediately after those words the following——

Mr. BLAIR. Not after those words, but at the end of line 9 of section 1.

Mr. DAWES. Then at the end of section 1 I move to add these words:

Any assent or alleged agreement to receive a less amount or to work a longer time, required as a condition of being employed, to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. BLAIR. I feel authorized to accept that so far as the committee are concerned. It is in entire accordance with the bill.

The question being put, a division was called for; and the ayes were 20, the noes 20.

Mr. VEST. I call for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri asks for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. VEST. I withdraw the call.

Mr. STEWART. I renew it.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MANDERSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN].

Mr. PLATT (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM]. I should vote for the amendment if he were present.

Mr. SPOONER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WALTHALL]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. CULLOM. I desire to state that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] are both absent at the centennial in Cincinnati and are paired with each other until their return. I make this announcement once for all.

Mr. DAWES. I am paired with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY].

The result was announced—yeas 22, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—22.

Blair,	Dolph,	Mitchell,	Teller,
Bowen,	Farwell,	Palmer,	Turpie,
Cameron,	Frye,	Sabin,	Voorhees,
Chandler,	Hale,	Sawyer,	Wilson of Iowa.
Cullom,	Hawley,	Stewart,
Davis,	Hoar,	Stockbridge,

NAYS—23.

Bate,	Call,	Gibson,	Pugh,
Beck,	Cockrell,	Gray,	Reagan,
Berry,	Coke,	Hampton,	Vance,
Blodgett,	Colquitt,	Kenna,	Vest,
Brown,	Faulkner,	McPherson,	Wilson of Md.
Butler,	George,	Pasco,

ABSENT—31.

Aldrich,	Evarts,	Manderson,	Ransom,
Allison,	Gorman,	Morgan,	Riddleberger,
Blackburn,	Harris,	Morrill,	Saulsbury,
Chace,	Hearst,	Paddock,	Sherman,
Daniel,	Hiscock,	Payne,	Spooner,
Dawes,	Ingalls,	Platt,	Stanford,
Edmunds,	Jones of Arkansas,	Plumb,	Walthall.
Eustis,	Jones of Nevada,	Quay,

So the amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask for the yeas and nays on the third reading of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Shall the bill be engrossed for a third reading? On this question the Senator from Missouri asks that the yeas and nays may be entered on the Journal.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DAWES (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] or I should vote "yea."

Mr. MANDERSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN].

Mr. PAYNE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. PLATT (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. SPOONER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WALTHALL]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa (after having voted in the affirmative). I am paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WILSON], and I therefore withdraw my vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa withdraws his vote.

Mr. MANDERSON. I announced my pair under the supposition that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN], if present, would vote "nay" on this bill. I should vote "yea" if I were not paired.

The result was announced—yeas 23, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—23.

Blair,	Dolph,	Hoar,	Stewart,
Bowen,	Farwell,	Kenna,	Stockbridge,
Cameron,	Faulkner,	Mitchell,	Teller,
Chandler,	Frye,	Palmer,	Turpie,
Cullom,	Hale,	Sabin,	Voorhees.
Davis,	Hawley,	Sawyer,

NAYS—22.

Bate,	Call,	Gray,	Pugh,
Beck,	Cockrell,	Hampton,	Reagan,
Berry,	Coke,	Hearst,	Vance,
Blodgett,	Colquitt,	Jones of Arkansas,	Vest.
Brown,	George,	McPherson,
Butler,	Gibson,	Pasco,

ABSENT—31.

Aldrich,	Evarts,	Morrill,	Saulsbury,
Allison,	Gorman,	Paddock,	Sherman,
Blackburn,	Harris,	Payne,	Spooner,
Chace,	Hiscock,	Platt,	Stanford,
Daniel,	Ingalls,	Plumb,	Walthall,
Dawes,	Jones of Nevada,	Quay,	Wilson of Iowa,
Edmunds,	Manderson,	Ransom,	Wilson of Md.
Eustis,	Morgan,	Riddleberger,

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and it was read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Having been read three times, the question now is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DAWES (when his name was called). I would vote "yea" if I were not paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY].

Mr. MANDERSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN]. If he were present, he would vote "nay" and I should vote "yea."

Mr. PLATT (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. STEWART. I will transfer the pair of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] to the Senator from California [Mr. STANFORD].

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Very well. Then I vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. COLQUITT (after having voted in the negative). I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE], and I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. BATE. My colleague [Mr. HARRIS] is paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL].

The result was announced—yeas 25, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—25.

Blair,	Farwell,	Mitchell,	Teller,
Bowen,	Faulkner,	Palmer,	Turpie,
Cameron,	Frye,	Sabin,	Voorhees,
Chandler,	Hale,	Sawyer,	Wilson of Iowa.
Cullom,	Hawley,	Spooner,
Davis,	Hoar,	Stewart,
Dolph,	Kenna,	Stockbridge,

NAYS—22.

Bate,	Call,	Hampton,	Reagan,
Beck,	Cockrell,	Hearst,	Vance,
Berry,	Coke,	Jones of Arkansas,	Vest,
Blodgett,	George,	McPherson,	Walthall.
Brown,	Gibson,	Pasco,
Butler,	Gray,	Pugh,

ABSENT—29.

Aldrich,	Eustis,	Morgan,	Riddleberger,

Colquitt,	Hiscock,	Platt,	Wilson of Md.
Daniel,	Ingalls,	Plumb,
Dawes,	Jones of Nevada,	Quay,
Edmunds,	Manderson,	Ransom,

So the bill was passed.

ADMISSION OF WASHINGTON.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the next order of the day, being the bill (S. 12) to provide for the formation and admission into the Union of the State of Washington, and for other purposes.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read.

Mr. STEWART. The substitute only need be read. It is not necessary to read the original bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment reported by the Committee on Territories will be read.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, pending that request, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 26, noes 16.

Mr. STEWART. I give notice now before the result is declared that I will call the bill up immediately after the morning business to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 38 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, July 18, 1888, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, July 17, 1888.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Monday was read and approved.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER AT WABASHA, MINN.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 7749), with Senate amendments, to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at Wabasha, Minn.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. I ask unanimous consent that the House concur in the Senate amendment to this bill and the bill be put on its final passage.

There was no objection.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. The amendments to this bill are merely formal and make no essential change in the bill—only making it correspond to the rules that have been adopted as to such bills. This bill merely pertains to the bridging of that part of the Mississippi River which is not navigable. It has been approved by the Secretary of War, and I think the reading of the amendments might be dispensed with. I ask unanimous consent to that effect.

There was no objection.

The Senate amendments were concurred in.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota, moved to reconsider the vote by which the Senate amendments were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GENERAL GEORGE ROGERS CLARK.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 2967) to provide for the erection of a monument to the memory of General George Rogers Clark; which was referred to the Committee on the Library, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PRINTING OF REPORT ON NEWBURGH (N. Y.) CENTENNIAL.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing, and ordered to be printed:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, July 16, 1888.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the report of the Joint Select Committee of Congress on the Newburgh (N. Y.) Monument and Centennial Celebration of 1883, submitted on the 26th of June, 1886, be printed, and that 4,500 copies be printed and bound in cloth; of which 1,000 shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,000 for the use of the House, and 1,500 for the use of the Joint Select Committee.

BRIDGE ACROSS ARKANSAS RIVER AT OR NEAR CUMMINGS LANDING.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 3215) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Arkansas River at or near Cummings Landing, Lincoln County, Arkansas.

Mr. CLARDY. Mr. Speaker, that is identical with a House bill which has been reported for the same purpose, and I ask that the Senate bill be now considered. The bill is in the usual form, and I ask unanimous consent that the reading of it be dispensed with.

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CLARDY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

J. T. VINCENT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House an order of the Senate directing its Secretary to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (H. R. 10356) granting a pension to J. T. Vincent.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the request of the Senate will be complied with, and the Clerk will be directed to return the bill.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. BROWER, by unanimous consent, obtained indefinite leave of absence, on account of important business.

BUSINESS REPORTED FROM THE COMMITTEE ON COMMERCE.

Mr. CLARDY. Mr. Speaker, I now renew the request I made yesterday for an evening session to consider bills reported from the Committee on Commerce to which there is no objection, light-house bills, light-saving stations bills, bridge bills, and right of way bills.

Mr. BLAND. I ask, Mr. Speaker, that all night sessions shall be limited, so as not to continue later than half past 10 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. What evening does the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARDY] suggest?

Mr. CLARDY. This evening.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARDY] asks unanimous consent that a recess be taken this afternoon at o'clock until 8 o'clock p. m.; the evening session to be devoted exclusively to the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on Commerce, bridge bills, light-house bills, and life-saving stations bills; the evening session not to extend beyond half past 10 o'clock p. m. Is there objection?

Mr. HAUGEN. If the gentleman will strike out "bridge bills" from his request, I will not object; otherwise I must object.

Mr. BLAND. My request, Mr. Speaker, was for unanimous consent that all evening sessions hereafter be limited to half past 10 o'clock.

Mr. HAUGEN. I withdraw my objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARDY].

The SPEAKER. Is there further objection?

Mr. FINLEY. I object.

Mr. BLAND. Regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded. The regular order is the call of committees for reports.

Mr. McMILLIN. I ask unanimous consent that gentlemen having reports to present be allowed to file them with the Clerk in the usual manner.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

FILING OF REPORTS.

The following reports were filed by being handed in at the Clerk's desk:

Mr. YODER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 10137) for the relief of Francis A. Field; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CUMBERLAND PRESBYTERIAN CHURCHES.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. McMILLIN. I now ask unanimous consent that the morning hour for the call of committees for reports be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Will that interfere with a report upon a resolution of inquiry?

The SPEAKER. The report could not be considered, and the gentleman had better withhold it for the present. The report is a privileged one, which the gentleman can make notwithstanding this request.

By unanimous consent, the morning hour for the call of committees was dispensed with.

Mr. FINLEY. I withdraw my objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARDY] for an evening session. My objection was based upon the idea that we have been asking for a night session for the consideration of war claims, and so far have not succeeded in getting one. I do not desire to block legislation upon other matters, but I think there ought to be a reasonable amount of concession all around.

Mr. HERBERT. I ask that the order for the evening session for the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on Commerce shall include right-of-way bills.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand that the Committee on Commerce has reported any right-of-way bills.

Mr. CLARDY. The committee has reported one such bill.

Mr. PETERS. I shall object to the continuation of the night session until half past 10 o'clock. I shall not object if the session terminates at 10 o'clock.

Mr. CLARDY. Then I will modify the request so as to have the session end at 10 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. Is there further objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARDY]?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

BUSINESS FROM COMMITTEE ON WAR CLAIMS.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a recess be taken from 5 to 8 o'clock p. m. on July 25, the evening session to be devoted to the consideration of Senate and House bills reported from the Committee on War Claims to which there is no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. PETERS. I shall object unless the session terminates at 10 o'clock.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I will so modify the request.

The SPEAKER. Is there further objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ARMY AND NAVY OFFICERS, ETC., IN MEXICAN WAR.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I rise to make a privileged report.

The report was read, as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, July 14, 1888.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, requested to inform the House of Representatives what action has been taken by him, if any, with reference to officers of the United States Army, Navy, and Marine Corps who served honorably throughout the Mexican war and whose names have been dropped from the rolls.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The Committee on Military Affairs have authorized me to make a favorable report on that resolution and ask for its adoption.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire to have the report read?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I do not unless the House desires it.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. TOWNSHEND moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MANAGERS OF SOLDIERS' HOME.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] sends to the desk, as the Chair understands, another privileged resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, May 21, 1888.

Whereas the term of James S. Negley is about to expire as manager of the Soldiers' Home, and a vacancy will be created in said board requiring a new appointment to be made: Therefore——

The SPEAKER. This is not a resolution of inquiry, and is not privileged.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Then I withdraw it.

EMILY J. STANNARD.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted the following conference report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 2657) granting an increase of pension to Emily J. Stannard, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its amendment to the said bill and agree to the same.

C. C. MATSON,
J. L. CHIPMAN,
J. H. GALLINGER,
Managers on the part of the House.
H. W. BLAIR,
C. L. DAVIS,
D. TURPIE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to call attention to what seems to be an error in this report. It reads:

That the House recede from its amendment to the said bill and agree to the same.

Probably it was intended to read, "recede from its disagreement to the amendment."

Mr. GALLINGER. That was undoubtedly what was meant. The bill passed the Senate and the House amended it. I suggest that the necessary change be made.

The SPEAKER. Has the Senate agreed to the conference report?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. Then the Chair supposes it can not be corrected by the House. The report will probably be understood.

The following statement of the House conferees, submitted under the rule, was read:

Mr. GALLINGER, in behalf of the managers on the part of the House, made the following statement of facts:

The bill to pension Emily J. Stannard passed the Senate at $100 per month. The bill was amended by the House so as to reduce the amount to $75 per month. The Senate non-concurred in the amendment, and a conference committee was appointed. At that conference the managers on the part of the House receded from the amendment and agreed to the Senate bill in its original form. This they did because of the exceptional merits of the claim, so far as the soldier's services were concerned, and the deplorable condition of the claimant from poverty and incurable disease.

The report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER moved to reconsider the vote by which the report of the committee of conference was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TARIFF.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to resume the consideration of the tariff bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. SPRINGER in the chair), and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the pending amendment.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I rise to a parliamentary question. There are amendments under consideration that cover both sections 25 and 26 of the bill. The Clerk has only read section 25. Would it not be well to read section 26 now for the general consideration of this subject of revenue tax on tobacco?

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection the Clerk will read, in this connection, section 26.

Mr. MCMILLIN. What is the request?

The CHAIRMAN. That the twenty-sixth section be read, so that amendments can be offered to the two sections together, treating them as one paragraph.

Mr. MCMILLIN. We have already as many amendments pending as can be offered; and I have an amendment which I wish to offer to section 26 as soon as I can get the opportunity.

The CHAIRMAN. The proposition is simply to consider these two sections as one paragraph, that amendments may be offered to both at the same time.

Mr. FARQUHAR. By omitting to read the twenty-sixth section, it is not considered as under consideration; but there are amendments pending which cover both sections. I submit that it would be well to have both sections officially read, so as to be under consideration.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I have no objection to the reading, with the understanding that I can offer an amendment which the Committee on Ways and Means desire to propose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read section 26.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 26. That on and after the 1st day of July, 1888, manufacturers of cigars shall each pay a special tax of $3 annually, and dealers in tobacco shall each pay a special tax of $1 annually. Every person whose business it is to sell or offer for sale cigars, cheroots, or cigarettes shall, on and after the 1st day of May, 1888, be regarded as a dealer in tobacco, and the payment of any other special tax shall not relieve any person who sells cigars, cheroots, or cigarettes from the payment of this tax: Provided, That no manufacturer of cigars, cheroots, or cigarettes shall be required to pay a special tax as a dealer in tobacco, as above defined, for selling his own products at the place of manufacture.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SOWDEN] has an amendment pending.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Pursuant to the agreement under which the twenty-sixth section was read I wish to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SOWDEN] takes precedence.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I stated that there were all the amendments pending to the former paragraph which could be offered, but I consented to the reading of the twenty-sixth section, with the understanding that I could offer this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not so understand; but accepts the gentleman's statement.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I will yield the floor to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SOWDEN] as soon as this amendment is disposed of.

The Clerk read the amendment of Mr. MCMILLIN, as follows:

Insert at the close of section 26:

"Provided further, That the bond required to be given in conformity with the provisions of Title XXXV of the Revised Statutes of the United States, by every person engaged in the manufacture of cigars in the internal-revenue districts of the United States shall be in such penal sum as the collector of internal revenue may require, not less than $100, with an addition of $10 for each person proposed to be employed by such person in making cigars."

Mr. MCMILLIN. I now yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SOWDEN].

The CHAIRMAN. The question will first be upon agreeing to the amendment which has just been reported.

Mr. BREWER. How does it happen that this amendment comes in ahead of the other.

The CHAIRMAN. By unanimous consent.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, which the Clerk will report, sections 25 and 26 now being under consideration and amendments being in order to either or both sections.

Mr. NICHOLS. I would like to have my substitute reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding: "And all internal-revenue taxes on spirits distilled from apples, peaches, and other fruits.

Mr. SOWDEN. I now submit the following, which I desire to have read by the Clerk.

The CHAIRMAN. No other amendment is in order until this is disposed of.

Mr. SOWDEN. I desire to have the amendment read in my time, as part of my remarks.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting the following after section 25, and designate the same as section 27: "That all laws imposing any internal-revenue taxes on spirits distilled from apples, peaches, and other fruits are hereby repealed, and that on all original and unbroken hogsheads, barrels, or kegs of such spirits held by manufacturers or dealers at the time this act shall go into effect, upon which the tax has been paid, there shall be allowed a drawback or rebate of the full amount of the tax so paid; but the same shall not apply in any case where the claim has not been ascertained or presented within ninety days following the date of the repeal. It shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, to adopt such rules and regulations, and to prescribe and furnish such blanks and forms as may be necessary to carry this section into effect."

Mr. SOWDEN. I desire now that the amendment may be deemed as pending, so that it may be renewed at the proper time after the disposition of section 27 of the bill. I therefore withdraw the amendment which I offered to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment submitted by him yesterday to the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia; and gives notice that he will hereafter call up the amendment just read by the Clerk.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs upon the amendment to the amendment to the text of this bill submitted by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] yesterday.

Mr. MCMILLIN. If I may be indulged for a moment, I think it proper to correct the text of the bill before the amendment is voted upon. I therefore move to strike out, in section 25, line 1, the word "July" and insert "October."

The CHAIRMAN. That has already been done in section 25, but not in section 26.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Then I move to strike out, in line 1, section 26, the word "July" and insert "October;" and in the same section, in line 6, at the top of page 60, strike out "May" and insert "October."

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] on yesterday, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, in line 3, on page 59, the word "and" before the word "snuff," and add thereafter the words "cigars, cheroots, and cigarettes;" so that the clause when amended will read:

"That on and after the 1st day of October, 1888, all taxes on manufactured chewing tobacco, smoking tobacco, snuff, cigars, cheroots, and cigarettes."

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on this amendment is exhausted.

The question was taken, and the Chair declared the "noes" seemed to have it.

Mr. WISE. I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 43, noes 78.

Mr. WISE. I ask for tellers.

Tellers were refused.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment submitted by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. NICHOLS].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out all after the word "that," in line 1, section 25, and insert the following; so that the same shall read:

"SEC. 25. That all clauses of section 3140 to section 3465, both inclusive, of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and all other laws relating to internal-revenue taxes are hereby repealed to take effect on the 1st day of December, 1888: Provided, That all laws now in force shall have full force and effect in respect to all offenses committed, liabilities incurred, or rights accruing or accrued prior to the date when this section shall take effect: Provided further, That on all original and unbroken factory packages of smoking or manufactured tobacco, snuff, cigars, cheroots, or other forms of tobacco held by manufacturers, factors, jobbers, or dealers at such time as this section shall take effect, and upon all unbroken packages, kegs, barrels or other receptacles of distilled spirits and brewed liquors, held by distillers, dealers, or other owners of such spirits or liquors at such time this section shall take effect, there shall be a drawback or rebate in favor of such manufacturer, factor, jobber, distiller, dealer, or other owner, as the case may be, to the full amount of the tax paid thereon: Provided further, That all special-tax stamps covering taxes repealed by this act may be redeemed for the portion of the special-tax year unexpired at the time of the repeal: Provided further, That no claim for rebate under this section shall be for a less amount than $5, and all claims for rebate as herein provided for shall be presented within ninety days after this section shall take effect, otherwise the same shall be forever barred; and all sums required to satisfy claims under this section shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall adopt such rules and regulations and furnish such blanks and forms as may be necessary to carry this section into effect.

"SEC. 26. That this act shall be in force from and after December 1, 1888, and all laws and parts of laws in conflict herewith are hereby repealed."

Mr. MCMILLIN. I make the point that that is in substance the same amendment which has already been offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON] and voted down by the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. This is a different proposition.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I move to amend section 26, line 3, by striking out "three" and inserting "two," so as to provide that manufacturers of cigars shall pay a tax of $2 annually. In the discussion of this question yesterday the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM] called the attention of the House to a very large industry of organized labor, and I now send to the desk to be read resolutions adopted by the Cigar-Makers' International Union on the question which we have here under discussion.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Cigar-Makers' International Union of America adopted at the seventeenth session, held at Binghamton, N. Y., the following resolutions:

"Whereas an agitation is being vigorously prosecuted to abolish the internal revenue on cigars and tobacco;

"Whereas experience has demonstrated that the agitation, even, on this subject has had the effect of keeping thousands of workers of our trade out of employment for months at a time;

"Whereas the internal-revenue system, so far at least as it applies to the manufacture of cigars, has had the effect of developing it from a mere sporadic calling into a fully established industry by which nearly 75,000 of our people earn their livelihood;

"Whereas the abolition of the internal revenue on cigars would not benefit either producer or consumer by reason of its fractional bearing on each cigar: Therefore, be it

"Resolved, That we, the representatives of the cigar-makers of the country, in convention assembled, protest respectfully, but emphatically, against any interference with the internal revenue on cigars."

Mr. FARQUHAR. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say, in connection with these resolutions, that they speak the desires of a skilled labor union which embraces in its membership some thirty-five thousand men. That union also holds in its treasury, divided among the subordinate unions, over $300,000 per annum for sick relief, employment, and beneficent purposes. There are no tramps in this trade. The unions provide liberally and ungrudgingly for their sick and for those of their number who are out of employment. In the great battle that was fought in the State of New York not long ago this international union spent nearly $10,000 to regulate their own trade.

Without adventitious help from the outside those men, out of their own earnings and wise action, have brought their trade to the point where it is one of the best regulated and most firmly established in America, and I think it is due to this great organization of skilled labor, to the men who represent it, and to the expression they have made through their convention, that this Congress shall be cautious in whatever action it may take in respect to this internal-revenue legislation, deeply affecting it.

It is well known, Mr. Chairman, to those of us who were present in the Forty-ninth Congress how apt, how quick, how eager gentlemen were to have the oleomargarine business regulated. This bill as it stands now is in the line of a fair regulation of the cigar trade, for sustaining the credit of worth to be attached to brands of cigars, for the regulation of the manufacture, and for the keeping down of tenement-house work and two-thirds and even child labor; and it is due to these men who have spent so much time and money in perfecting their organization, and whose object is to keep their trade honest and fair for themselves as well as for those who employ them, that this Congress shall be conservative in its action upon this subject. I desire also to have printed in the RECORD, for the information of the House, an article which exactly shows the animus and selfishness back of the proposition to abolish the whole of the internal-revenue tax on cigars.

There are two States specially interested in it, Pennsylvania and California. The Six Chinese Companies of California desire nothing better than to open the doors for Chinese labor to flood the markets with cheap and inferior cigars, and to break down the standard brands that are regulated and sustained by the Cigar-makers' International Union.

The article referred to by Mr. FARQUHAR, from the "Cigar-makers' Official Journal," was read, as follows:

THE INTERNAL-REVENUE TAX.

A number of cigar-dealers favor a repeal of the internal-revenue laws who are actuated by motives of self-interest, to which nobody can object under existing conditions. The dealer favors the repeal in the prospect of compelling the manufacturer to sell at lower rates. He believes in buying in the lowest and selling in the highest market; hence he favors a more stringent competition both among workmen and manufacturers.

A Western cigar dealer who favors the repeal of the tax argues as follows:

"The cost of material is small, and if the workmen be allowed to use the deft fingers of wife and children in the preparation of the leaf all that he needs is to be let alone. In this way a home-made, genuine article can be put on the market at the lowest cost by the maker and in a small way."

The gist of his argument is in a nut-shell; it means the extension of the system of tenement-house cigar-factories all over the country; it means the adoption of the "sweating system" under which cheap clothing, overalls, and underwear of all kinds are manufactured in the dwelling-houses of the poorest among the poor.

Such absurd arguments are presented to members of Congress in the interest of workmen by leaf-dealers and cigar-dealers.

Another class that favors the repeal of the internal-revenue laws are the six Chinese companies and employers of cooly labor on the Pacific coast. The caution label and the branding of the boxes, as required by law, are obnoxious to them, because it enables the consumer to recognize Chinese-made cigars. This has not only diminished their sales, but has also reduced their price in the market. Remove the internal-revenue tax and cigar-making in the opium dens of Chinatown will double within six months; all obstacles for their sale will be removed.

During the calendar year 1885 California manufactured 137,679,023 cigars. During the calendar year of 1886 only 127,402,329 cigars were manufactured, showing a decrease of 10,276,694 cigars.

This has been accomplished by agitation against Chinese-made cigars, which could not be continued with success were the tax repealed.

The whole agitation for the repeal of the internal-revenue laws appears to be in favor of the Six Chinese Companies, employers of cooly labor and dealers in cigars manufactured in Chinatown of San Francisco.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I desire also to call the attention of the House to the following official communication from the Buffalo Central Labor Union:

The letter was read as follows:

BUFFALO, N. Y., January 24, 1888.

DEAR SIR: At a regular meeting of the Buffalo Central Labor Union the question of the abolition of the internal revenue on cigars was very thoroughly discussed, and by a unanimous vote I was instructed to respectfully but emphatically enter a protest against the removal of the tax on cigars. The Central Labor Union trusts you will use your influence and vote to retain the revenue on cigars, and do your utmost to defeat any and all measures which seek to abolish the internal revenue.

The cigar business of the country is now firmly established, and the abolition of the tax will bring disaster and ruination to the entire cigar industry.

The Cigar-makers' International Union at Binghamton, N. Y., and the cigar manufacturers of the United States at New York City, in their respective conventions, protested against the removal of the tax on cigars.

I remain, yours, respectfully,

JOHN C. DERNELL,
Secretary Buffalo Central Labor Union.

HON. JOHN M. FARQUHAR,
Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.

Mr. FARQUHAR. In addition to numerous protests from labor unions, composed of male members, against any action of Congress looking to the abolition of the wholesome Government regulations of cigar manufacture, I wish to present the following resolutions, adopted by the Working Women's Society of New York:

Whereas it has come to our knowledge that attempts are to be made by certain manufacturers to re-establish the making of cigars in tenement houses, and recognizing that this nefarious system of manufacture affects most heavily the health and comfort of women and children, and is destructive of the decency and morality of the families that engage in it, the Working Women's Society most earnestly protest against the re-establishment of this vile and pernicious system of manufacture, and in the name and for the sake of these helpless, suffering women and children, call upon an enlightened and humane public opinion to support us in this protest. We also offer the cigarmakers' unions our hearty sympathy and support in their contest with this evil against society.

The horrors of this system of manufacture have been fully exposed in the annual report of the State bureau of labor for 1885, page 178; also in volume I of the report of the senate committee on capital and labor, pages 271 to 275, and to these accounts we refer the public.

Mr. THOMAS H. B. BROWNE. Mr. Chairman, I send to the Clerk's desk a joint resolution of the Legislature of Virginia to be read in the debate upon this section.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution in regard to repeal of internal revenue, agreed to December 19, 1887.

Resolved (the house of delegates concurring), That our Senators in Congress be instructed, and our Representatives requested—

First. To use their best efforts to secure the immediate repeal of the internal-revenue system, a relic of the war and no longer necessary to meet the demands of the Government, and because it is oppressive, fosters monopolies, and is obnoxious to the interests of our people.

Second. To favor the revenue requisite for the support of the Government by a tariff upon imports limited to the necessities of the Government economically administered, and so adjusted in its application as to prevent unequal burdens, encourage productive interests at home, the development of our natural resources, and afford just compensation to labor, but not to foster monopolies.

Mr. THOMAS H. B. BROWNE. I desire to say that this resolution represents not only the sentiments of the Democratic Legislature of Virginia, but is an extract from a platform of principles announced by a Democratic convention called at Roanoke, in Virginia, in August, 1887, and for no other purpose, apparently, than to emphasize the prevailing sentiment of the Democratic party upon such measures as were agitating the public mind, such as the repeal of the internal-revenue taxes and the passage of the Blair bill, which was also declared in favor of by the Virginia Legislature in the following resolution:

Resolved (the house of delegates concurring), That the Senators from Virginia be instructed, and the members of the House of Representatives in Congress from Virginia be requested to vote for Federal aid to public free schools, and to support the measure commonly known as the Blair bill, or some other better measure.

From this it may naturally be inferred that the reduction of the surplus in the Treasury is what was aimed at as well as the adoption of those measures which so far as common observation goes will receive no more consideration by this House than if they had never been thought of, certainly if we may judge the resolution read by the fate which that relating to the Blair bill has met here. More than a dozen bills covering its subject are now lying in the room of the Committee on Education yet unfolded, and a Senate bill for the object yet untouched for the want of a quorum of the committee to act on it. If this is the way the will of a sovereign State, and that sovereign State dominated by a Democratic government, is to be trifled with by a Democratic majority here, how long, may I ask, will the people submit to have their patience thus abused? And it may not be out of place here to quote Mr. Jefferson on the repeal of internal taxes and the surplus. In his first inaugural address, December 8, 1801, he said:

Other circumstances, combined with the increase of numbers, have produced an augmentation of revenue arising from consumption in a ratio far beyond that of population alone, and though the changes of foreign relations now taking place, so desirable for the world, may for a season affect this branch of revenue, yet, weighing all probabilities of expense, as well as of income, there is reasonable ground of confidence that we may now safely dispense with all internal taxes.

In his second inaugural address, March 4, 1805, he said:

At home, fellow-citizens, you best know whether we have done well or ill. The suppression of unnecessary offices, of useless establishments and expenses, enabled us to discontinue our internal taxes. These, covering our land with officers and opening our doors to their intrusions, had already begun that process of domiciliary vexation which, once entered, is scarcely to be restrained from reaching successfully every article of produce and property. If among these taxes some minor ones fell which had not been inconvenient, it was because their amount would not have paid the officers who collected them, and because, if they had any merit, the State authorities might adopt them instead of others less approved. The remaining revenue on the consumption of foreign articles is paid cheerfully by those who can afford to add foreign luxuries to domestic comforts, and being collected on our seaboard and frontiers only, and incorporated with the transactions of our mercantile citizens, it may be the pleasure and pride of an American to ask, "What farmer, what mechanic, what laborer ever sees a tax-gatherer of the United States?"

Now, Mr. Chairman, in what strange contrast is this with the utterances contained in the annual message of the Democratic President of December 6, 1887. Mr. Cleveland says:

It must be conceded that none of the things subjected to internal-revenue taxation are, strictly speaking, necessaries; there appears to be no just complaint of this taxation by the consumers of those articles and there seems to be nothing so well able to bear the burden without hardship to any portion of the people.

When we see that the President has in his mind only the welfare of the consumer he has none of that high regard for the producer, the farmer of the land, who is so grievously wronged by this system which Mr. Jefferson so severely criticised; and if we may judge from the extract just quoted and the action of the majority relating thereto as proposed by the pending bill, this system is here for all time and its subjects continually to be discriminated against and the States deprived of the fullness of their revenue from such of them as can afford to bear the tax.

Mr. McMILLIN. In regard to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FARQUHAR], I wish to say that the special tax of $3 annually provided for in this bill, which he seeks to have reduced to $2, is itself a reduction of 50 per cent. from the present law. Prior to 1883 the law fixed this special tax at $10. The law of 1883 reduced it to $6. This bill proposes to reduce it to $3, and if the supervision which the gentleman from New York favors is to be kept up at all, the tax certainly ought to be kept at a point sufficiently high to pay the expenses of it. This tax all along the line has been reduced to a merely nominal rate, which will barely pay for the work necessary to be done, leaving the Government to derive its entire revenue from the tax upon the cigars themselves.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Mr. Chairman, in view of the explanation of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN], I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment.

There was no objection.

Mr. SOWDEN. I move to strike out section 26. It seems to me quite unnecessary that this special tax on the manufacturers of cigars and tobacco should be maintained. It is alleged by the Committee on Ways and Means that their object in this bill is to do away with unnecessary taxation, yet they propose to keep up the special tax upon manufacturers of cigars and upon dealers in tobacco. The gentleman who has this matter practically in charge says that this tax is merely nominal. Admitting that to be true, is this "nominal" tax insisted upon merely for the purpose of retaining the vast machinery that is employed to collect it? We have nearly four thousand office-holders, at an expense to the tax-payers of nearly $5,000,000, in order to collect the internal-revenue taxes, taxes which admittedly we do not need for the economical and prudent administration of this Government. Is it not time to strike down these unnecessary offices? Ought we not to lop them off and save the tax-payers of the country the nearly $5,000,000 they entail upon them? The tax which my amendment, if adopted, would repeal can easily be dispensed with without any injury to the revenues of the country and at the same time would relieve a large class of producers from its unjust provisions.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Would not the proposition which the gentleman makes reduce these four thousand office-holders below the level of "the pauper labor of Europe?" [Laughter.]

Mr. SOWDEN. The gentleman compares these office-holders to the pauper labor of Europe, but there is nothing in that. [Laughter.]

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SOWDEN. I now call up my amendment to come in after section 26.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Amend by inserting the following after section 26, and designating it as section 27:

"That all laws imposing any internal taxes on spirits distilled from apples, peaches, and other fruits are hereby repealed, and that on all original and unbroken hogsheads, barrels, or kegs of such spirits held by manufacturers or dealers at the time this act shall go into effect, upon which the tax has been paid, there shall be allowed a drawback or rebate of the full amount of the tax so paid; but the same shall not apply in any case where the claim has not been ascertained or presented within ninety days following the date of the repeal. It shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, to adopt such rules and regulations and to prescribe and furnish such blanks and forms as may be necessary to carry this section into effect."

Mr. SOWDEN. Mr. Chairman, $1,090,379 is the amount of the tax which the Government collected on spirits distilled from apples, peaches, grapes, and other fruits during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887. This tax is a particularly severe one upon the farmers of the country and the growers of fruit, and since gentlemen on this side of the House are so tenderly devoted to the interests of the poor farmer, I hope they will see the necessity of coming to his relief now and of not robbing him of another million dollars by this tax during the next fiscal year, especially when we have such a large surplus in the Treasury, which is giving us so much concern and which we are so anxious to reduce. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that there ought to be no hesitation about adopting this amendment, and by its adoption relieve the farmers and the small distillers who distill spirits from apples, peaches, and grapes from the burden imposed upon them under existing law.

Mr. COWLES. Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in favor of this amendment and shall support it. It gives relief to a large body of people living in the mountain sections of this country especially. The amount of revenue involved, it is reasonable to say, is only a little more than a million dollars—$1,090,000, I believe, in round numbers. The necessity of getting rid of the surplus in the Treasury is urged on both sides of the House. Now, taking all the reduction that this bill will make in all its provisions, we can easily go this much further and still leave a large surplus. Why not do it? Why should not both sides of the House meet on this question? If there be any truth in the protestations of party, if there be any truth in the protestations of individuals, that we want to give relief to the people in this matter of taxation, why not come forward and embrace the first chance we have had to vote upon such a question during many sessions of Congress? Now is the time and this is the hour when every man should come forward, without regard to party and political affiliations, and vote for this relief to the people.

Sir, it was amusing on yesterday when my good friend from North Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON] inquired with regard to the status of the vote taken on his amendment which proposed to wipe out the entire internal-tax system, and for which I voted most cheerfully. When the Chair stated that twenty-seven gentlemen only had voted in the affirmative my friend asked in a tone of astonishment, "What has become of the Republican party and the pledges of the Chicago convention?" Why, sir, it reminded me of the old song, "What has become of good old Daniel?" The Republican party almost to a man were on that occasion found seated in quiet, conscious peace with the "lions" of the Ways and Means Committee on this side of the House. They did not vote for the proposition.

Why, my friends, then was the opportunity for you to come forward if you meant to do what your platform pledges. Ah, but you say, the pledge was made with a condition. What is the condition? Simply this: provided you can find no means of spending this surplus in ill-deserved pensions and jobs of every kind that may be brought here in the way of wild-cat appropriations. From your history in the past who doubts your ability to do so? Who doubts your ability to scatter the whole of the surplus in the Treasury if the people of the country allow you to get hold of the purse strings. That is the only condition upon which you agree to abolish internal revenue—provided you are not able to spend the surplus otherwise. When will you ever take steps to abolish this internal revenue? Never. You had the opportunity yesterday to do it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MILLIKEN obtained the floor and said: I will yield to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COWLES] if I can be recognized when he gets through.

Mr. COWLES. I ask unanimous consent to be allowed five minutes more.

There was no objection.

Mr. COWLES. Sir, it is a good old maxim which says "Honesty is the best policy;" and the noblest sentiment ever uttered by Grover Cleveland was "Tell the truth."

I shall go home from here a good deal wiser than I came with regard to the status of the abolishment of the internal-revenue tax; and I shall tell my people that a large majority on both sides of this House are opposed to it, unless future events shall convince me of the contrary.

And, sir, if any man is opposed to any portion of this tax why can he not come forward and vote for this amendment? It takes only about $1,000,000 from the Treasury. It gives relief to a great class of people who need it; and it does not affect the supply of breadstuffs in this country at all. It only enables people to utilize the fruit which would otherwise be wasted, and thus to supplement the little profits on their farms and eke out a subsistence for their families. I am satisfied it will not be the means of such extensive frauds in the whisky tax as are alleged here.

The manufacture of brandy in this country is so small that it can not be the means of working such tremendous fraud in the whisky tax. Besides, when we read of the discoveries of science in this matter of detecting fraud in the manufacture of lard, butter, etc., why can there not be means of detecting the component parts that enter into distilled spirits? Why can not provisions of law be made to punish the persons who would use this license to assist in the commission of fraud in the manufacture of whisky or in evading the whisky tax? I am willing to vote for any measure of that kind. All I want is an honest, straightforward relief to my people. I ask this because they have been long-suffering and uncomplaining. As long as this tax was needed by the Government they bore it with commendable patience and rarely complained. But they always complained of the system—of its inquisitorial branches. They complained of spies entering their houses and domiciles and the most intricate nooks and corners, without regard to the privacy of the home of the citizen; and now that all necessity has long since passed, they ask its removal. This is a most onerous system in the section of country I represent.

The report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for 1887 says that in 1887, 1,155 fruit distilleries existed in the State of North Carolina and 1,054 in the State of my friend from Virginia [Mr. WISE], many more than exist and nearly twice as many as exist in all the other States of this Union; this is because we have large fruit-growing districts which must in "good years" furnish a large share of the small farmers' profits. They are unable, many of them, to comply with the requirements of law, and if by dint of hard begging and laying themselves under mighty obligations to their more wealthy neighbors thus are enabled to give the bonds they become liable to be mulcted in heavy penalties by some technical failure to comply with all the regulations.

That is the reason why our people complain so bitterly about this grievous burden.

Now, sir, I ask that they shall have some relief. I ask that the people of these sections of the country who are entitled to some consideration shall have this burden removed, and it will not militate against the passage of this bill to grant it. I, sir, am as much in favor of some of the provisions of this bill as any one can be. I am for reducing taxation, and for reducing it upon articles which as much concern my people as the people of other sections of the country, but at the same time I ask that you give them some relief from a burden which is not borne by the people of many other sections of the country, and which will in nowise interfere with the necessary revenue for the support of the Government.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Mr. Chairman, I am glad to have heard the remarks of my friend from North Carolina [Mr. COWLES] on this occasion; because while he does not occupy the floor often, or very frequently demand the attention of the House in debate, he is one of those who has the frankness to speak his opinion as to legislation which has been pending in this House relating to pensions, and has the candor in that respect to voice the sentiment of his party in disapproval of pensions.

Mr. COWLES. Allow me to say that the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. MILLIKEN. He says that the Republican party are unwilling to reduce the revenues except they can do it by spending the money in the payment of "ill-deserved pensions."

Mr. COWLES. Do you want to pay ill-deserved pensions?

Mr. MILLIKEN. I was glad to hear it from him for one reason, and that is because it shows his opinion of what the duty of the country is to the soldiers——

Mr. COWLES. Allow me a moment.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Let me finish my sentence first.

Mr. COWLES. The gentleman mistakes my position.

Mr. MILLIKEN. The gentleman exhibits his opinion of what the duty of the country is towards the soldiers; and it is so well expressed in that sentence, which embodies what his party has shown to be their feelings, that I welcome it in that respect as being an authoritative expression of sentiment.

Mr. COWLES. If the gentleman will pardon me——

Mr. MILLIKEN. I hope my friend will keep quiet. I call my friend's attention to that expression because I have no doubt that before the morning sun shines the gentleman will, on reflection, see fit to strike it from the RECORD, because it is too bold and honest an expression of his party's position.

Mr. COWLES. The gentleman mistakes me altogether.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I do not desire it to be in the RECORD because he said it, but I do desire it to be there because, in two words, now here else to be found in the English language, can the position the Democratic party has occupied in this House since this Congress sat on the first Monday in December last, so well express what they have done and what they have shown to be their feeling upon the subject of pensions.

It is known here, if not to the country, that the Democracy, controlled by the late Confederates, consider all pensions to Union soldiers to be undeserved pensions. You give to the widows and dependents of the old Union soldiers and to the sick and wounded veterans some little crumb once in a long time, so as to save your credit as patriotic men; but every important measure presented to Congress for the relief of the soldiers, except one, the dependent-pension bill, you have defeated by parliamentary tactics or direct votes, and that measure your President vetoed, while he signed the Mexican pension bill, five-sixths of whose benefits go to ex-rebels. Your committee for effect among the soldiers has reported to this House pension bills which the Grand Army of the Republic have in their conventions recommended; but while you reported them to the House, with one single exception they have been denied consideration—one amendment to an appropriation bill which allows widows to draw their pensions from the time of the death of the husband instead of the date of the filing of the application, and that was but a confirmation of then existing law; with that single exception you have done nothing for the pensioners, and you do not mean to do anything.

You block the way of pension legislation and will not allow general pension bills to be considered in this House. No man can get recognition to call them up; or if, by the grace of the kind, courteous, and gentlemanly Speaker, who has sat in this House since I have been a member, any one does get recognition, some gentleman on the other side is swift to see that those bills are not taken up for consideration. He fights them, and, if necessary, uses all the sources of filibustering to smother them.

"Ill-deserved pensions." Yes; it was the real expression of the feeling of the Democratic party in the House in regard to all pensions, as shown by its action in this and prior Congresses.

Mr. COWLES. Allow me a moment.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Now, so far as that is concerned, I will leave my friend, when I get through, to explain himself in any manner he pleases; but I do congratulate him upon having that control of the English tongue, that conciseness of expression which has enabled him to put in two words the position of his party in this House upon the granting of pensions to Union soldiers—to the men who made it possible for him and for me to-day to stand under the flag of one country and to legislate here for a great republic that floats its banner more proudly in the faces of the nations of the earth than it ever did before. [Applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MCMILLIN. I wish to say in regard to the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and in response to what the gentleman from North Carolina said——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the amendment is exhausted.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Well, if we can have a vote I would rather have that than talk.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move to strike out the last word.

I would like, Mr. Chairman, to have the RECORD read, so as to show the exact language of my friend from North Carolina [Mr. COWLES] in regard to what he stated about the squandering of the surplus upon "ill-deserved" pensions.

Mr. COWLES. Will my friend allow me to correct him?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes, sir; I want to know what the gentleman said.

Mr. COWLES. I had no reference to well-deserved pensions granted to Union soldiers of the late war. I had no reference to them at all. I am not opposed to pensioning them. It is but natural and right. My remarks applied——

Mr. WILLIAMS. What was the language the gentleman used?

Mr. MILLIKEN. The RECORD will tell.

Mr. COWLES. It was the granting of pensions to those who were not deserving of them; those pensions that were founded in fraud. I referred to those pensions that have called for the executive vetoes by our excellent Chief Magistrate.

Mr. MILLIKEN. If the gentleman will let his language go into the RECORD as he said it, that is all we ask.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Republican party advocate the payment of pensions to the Union soldiers, and I want to say to the gentleman that the bills which are pending before this House, the bills for dependent pensions and service-pension bills, are the ones that we favor. I have been gratified in the past at the manifestation of warm interest in the welfare of the soldiers shown on that side of the Chamber.

Mr. COWLES. Allow me one question.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Wait until I get through.

Mr. COWLES. Are you in favor of granting pensions to soldiers who do not deserve them?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am in favor of pensioning every soldier who obtained an honorable discharge from the late war, having served in the defense of his country. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. COWLES. But answer my question. Are you in favor of pensions to soldiers who do not deserve them?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. They all deserve them.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Every Union soldier who can produce or prove an honorable discharge deserves a pension.

Mr. COWLES. Are you, I ask again, in favor of the payment of pensions to soldiers who do not deserve them?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No, sir; but that was not your language. Your language was "spending this surplus in ill-deserved pensions."

Mr. COWLES. That was exactly the idea that I expressed in what I said. I am as much in favor of pensions as the gentleman is to those who deserve them.

Mr. WILLIAMS. We have sat here all this session asking the other side of the House to give us a day to consider pension legislation, and we have been refused. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, further that it is a subject which touches me on a tender spot when the just claims of soldiers of 1861 are branded as ill-deserved pensions, for I can not help remembering that the gentleman from North Carolina himself and many of his colleagues, in fact all of us, are enabled to hold seats on this floor by virtue of their bravery in the war of the rebellion. [Applause.]

Why, sir, I am one of those who are willing to forget if in a proper manner the animosities and the hatreds that were engendered by the strife of 1861 are buried. But I want to say that this nation owes a debt of gratitude to the soldiers that we never can repay. Twenty-three years have passed away and the green grass and the golden grain garland the hundred battlefields of the South. The rifle-pits have been filled up and the earthworks have been trodden down. But now gentlemen come upon this floor and say that we on this side are desirous of squandering the public money in ill-deserved pensions. What pensions are ill-deserved? I want the gentlemen to answer that question. I say boldly that it is the duty of the Republican party as it should be the pride of the Democratic party to pension the soldiers who saved and preserved the Union and made it possible for the gentleman and many of his colleagues to hold seats on this floor and that portion of the Democratic party which attempted in 1861 to destroy this nation to be represented in this Congress.

The eloquent gentleman from Kentucky some months ago stated, and I have heard other eloquent gentlemen on that side say, that they were glad the slaves were free; they were glad the Union was restored; and forgetting the past they wanted to go forward in the path of prosperity and future greatness of this nation. I was glad to hear sentiments so patriotic from the other side. But I want no sneers at the soldiers of 1861. I want no sneers against the Union soldiers that went from their homes and their hearthstones bravely and without hesitation, yea, and were glad to do and die in behalf of the Union that was attempted to be destroyed, of the nation whose very existence was threatened by the armed hosts of a causeless rebellion. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I shall devote the time allotted to me in discussing the question under consideration. It is well known that if any member were to say this country was not liberal towards its soldiers he would not be believed, and ought not to be believed.

Now, what is the proposition under consideration? To take the tax entirely off from such spirits as are distilled from apples, peaches, and grapes.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Peaches and other fruit.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I wish to call the attention of the committee to one fact which stood in the way of the committee, and stands in the way of the House in this legislation. The Committee on Ways and Means went to the Treasury Department and gave very careful attention to the question now under consideration. We tried to see what would be right in the premises, and what could be done. We met with difficulty at the beginning. If you take 1 gallon of apple brandy and mix 2 gallons of pure whisky with it, it is all apple brandy and you can not tell the difference. There are no experts in this House [laughter], but if there were, Mr. Chairman, no expert could tell the difference by taste or appearance. It can not be detected. We could not devise any means of preventing frauds upon the revenue if we should free from taxation the spirits distilled from fruits.

Finding that difficulty, I went to the gentlemen from North Carolina who urged the proposition, and asked them if they would not offer an amendment which would do the work. I could not do it. The members of the committee could not do it. No man connected with the Treasury could do it. To this day no man who favors this amendment has offered any section that would begin to prevent frauds on the Government. That is the difficulty which stands in the way. You open the door to the freedom from taxation of spirits distilled from grain, and that may be mixed with brandy when you adopt this amendment. I would like the gentleman from Pennsylvania or any other gentleman who favors the proposition to submit an amendment which will prevent this fraud.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate upon the formal amendment is exhausted. If there be no objection the formal amendment will be considered as withdrawn.

Mr. SOWDEN. I renew it, Mr. Chairman. The argument of the gentleman from Tennessee is untenable. No one can pretend to say that large quantities of whisky would be removed to the small apple distilleries throughout the country and there mixed with spirits distilled from fruits. No member of this House will contend for one moment that he could not taste the difference between apple brandy and spirits distilled from grain, even if they were mixed half and half.

Mr. MCMILLIN. The gentleman is more expert than I thought any member of the House was.

Mr. SOWDEN. I do not think there is any member of this House, not even the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN], so entirely ignorant of the peculiar taste and smell which attach to apple brandy that he could not readily distinguish the difference between it and ordinary whisky.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Describe the difference to us.

Mr. SOWDEN. The gentleman's experience, I suppose, is such as not to require any description of the difference between them at my hands for his particular benefit.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the reasons advanced by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] in opposition to my amendment are not well grounded, and ought not to avail against its adoption. I contend that the farmers who use their surplus apples, peaches, and grapes in California, North Carolina, Virginia, Pennsylvania, and other States, in the distillation of spirits should not be compelled to pay a tax of over $1,000,000 annually into the public Treasury when the needs of the Government, honestly administered, do not require it. The members on this side of the House should be slow to vote against the pending amendment on the pretext furnished by the gentleman who has this bill in charge.

Mr. BREWER. Mr. Chairman, the question has been quite fully discussed here in regard to the removal of the internal-revenue tax upon brandies made from fruits as well as upon alcohol made from grain. There is a large class of people in this country who can not come here to speak for themselves, but can speak only through their petitions or letters which may be presented by those who represent them. I send to the desk to have read a communication which I have received expressing the views of thousands of the best women in the land touching the question of the removal of the tax upon all spirituous liquors.

The letter was read, as follows:

ELSIE, MICH., June 13, 1888.

DEAR SIR: I address you because I want you to give your whole influence towards "repeal of internal-revenue taxes." The time has come when it seems to me the United States Government can no longer be the senior partner in the liquor traffic of this land.

By this partnership we perpetuate and add respectability to the traffic, which is the source of three-fourths of all the crime of our land, besides the tears, the sorrows, the insanities, the pauperism, and the wretchedness untold. We want and ought not to have any complicity or connections with these ill-gotten gains. We protect every thing else but our children. They are exposed to the ravages of this foe to humanity. Greedy, fierce, heartless, relentless, the liquor traffic pursues, entraps, and destroys the innocent boys of our land. I need not tell you that this "internal revenue" stands in the way of better legislation, that it is the strong, impregnable fortress behind which the business of drunkard-making is intrenched. You know it.

Won't you as the Representative of the Sixth Michigan Congressional district do your utmost to secure the absolute and perpetual separation of the liquor crime and this Government?

Let us wash our hands and seek everlasting separation from that sort of traffic which destroys men, soul and body, for time and eternity.

MRS. ANNIE P. MOUNT,
Secretary W. C. T. U., Elsie, Mich.

Mr. MARK BREWER.

Mr. BREWER. I have presented that letter here, not only for the purpose of answering some of the arguments that have been made touching this question, but also because I know, as I have already said, that there are thousands and thousands of men and women in this country who believe that it is for the best interests of the people and for the cause of temperance and humanity that the taxes upon alcohol of all kinds should be entirely wiped out. While I do not wish at the present time to commit myself to all the views that are expressed in this letter, yet I desire to say that I heartily concur with what is said in it in relation to the evils of intemperance.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I rise to oppose the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on this amendment is exhausted; but if there be no objection the formal amendment will be considered as withdrawn, and the gentleman can renew it.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I renew the formal amendment. Mr. Chairman, a gentleman on the other side of the House made the remark a few moments since that if any man were to state that this country had not been liberal toward its soldiers he would not be believed. I desire to say, Mr. Chairman, for myself that in my judgment this country has not been liberal toward its soldiers.

How can a great Government like ours, with an overflowing Treasury, be said to be liberal towards its soldiers when thousands and thousands of them are in the almshouses of the country? Men who followed the nation's flag for three and four long and terrible years, men who were brave and valiant and true soldiers, and who obtained at the close of the war an honorable discharge, are to-day public paupers and are cared for as such.

Since this session of Congress began three of the men who appealed to me for help in the prosecution of their claims have died and were buried poor and penniless. Two of them were private soldiers. They were the kind of men who put down the rebellion—good men and true. It was shown by their neighbors that they were hale and healthy men when they entered the service and that they were never able-bodied men after the expiration of their term of service. Indeed, it was shown that from the time of their discharge to the time of their death they had never been able to perform a full day's work; and yet because they could not prove that they had some disability which they had incurred in the service they were permitted to live and die in want. The other claimant to whom I have referred was an old man, an itinerant Methodist preacher. A more patriotic man than he never lived. He was too old when the war began to enter the service himself, but he had three sons who caught the inspiration of the father and entered the Army at the opening of the war and went out to fight and die as heroes only dare to do. One fell in battle; another died in the hospital. One of these sleeps in the distant South and the other in the mountains of West Virginia. The third son returned home a physical wreck, and, I believe, is drawing a pension.

This old man was an applicant for a pension as a dependent parent, but failing to receive one I introduced a special act, and before it had been reached by the committee he passed away. He lived and died in poverty, although he had given his three sons to the country and although he had used his influence and had given his earnest support to the cause of the Union. I say it, and I say it with regret, that this country has not been generous toward its soldiers. Julius Cæsar, two thousand years ago, did more for his soldiers than we have ever done for ours. His army was more liberally rewarded than the soldiers of the late war have been. In a single campaign, after he had achieved a great victory, he doubled the compensation of every soldier in his army, and upon their return lands and houses and homes were generously given them. How can it be said that this country has been liberal toward its soldiers when there are thousands of them to-day who are in poverty and want; whose claims have been presented to the Department and rejected; whose bills are upon the Calendar of this Congress only to be denied? No one need tell me that this Government has been generous and liberal, when there are thousands of soldiers' widows bending over the wash-tub eking out a miserable existence for themselves and their children.

Mr. Chairman, the time has come when the very stones will cry out against the American people if they longer neglect the brave men whose claims are rejected on account of some trifling technicality, or the widows whose husbands sacrificed their lives on their country's altar, who are not pensioned because of some lack of testimony, or the orphans whose homes and lives have been made sad and desolate by the consequences of the war, or the dependent fathers and mothers who gave the idol of their hearts and the hope of their future to rescue the life of the nation. There are thousands of pension claims which have been rejected that are just as deserving as those which have been allowed, and some of those which have been rejected are more meritorious than some which have been allowed.

It is a shame and a disgrace that we have not met our obligations in this particular. The time has come when we ought to pension every honorably discharged soldier. We have already pensioned every Mexican soldier, including even those that subsequently entered the Confederate service and attempted to destroy the Republic. I have before me now a letter written by a soldier who is seventy-five years old, whose health is broken down and whose poverty and wants drive him almost to desperation. He says, "If another war were to come upon us, I would advise all the young men to feign sickness and get in the hospital so they would have a hospital record and have no trouble in geting a pension." How many of the best soldiers have been refused a pension because they never patronized the doctor or the hospital!

Mr. McMILLIN. On this question of the repeal of the tax on spirits I send to the desk to be read the utterance of a gentleman whose voice is always potent with his party.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. Blaine's "Paris message"——

Mr. McCLAMMY. I rise to a question of order. I desire to know whether it is in order to discuss the question of pensions upon a proposition to repeal the brandy tax. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in order to discuss any question except the question pending.

Mr. MILLIKEN. This question was raised on the other side of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was deciding a point of order. It is not in order to discuss any question except that which is pending in the Committee of the Whole. The rule states that any gentleman offering an amendment in the Committee of the Whole House shall be entitled to five minutes to explain his amendment, and any gentleman recognized thereafter may be entitled to five minutes to oppose the amendment, and thereupon the debate thereon is exhausted. Hence it is in order to discuss only the question under consideration. But large latitude has been indulged upon this question. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] desires to have read as part of his remarks an extract which he has sent to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

MR. BLAINE'S "PARIS MESSAGE."

I would not advise the repeal of the whisky tax——

Mr. BUCHANAN. I will inquire of the gentleman from Tennessee whether it is his purpose to have the whole of that letter incorporated in the RECORD.

Mr. McMILLIN. I only wish to have that portion read which bears on the repeal of the tax on whisky.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Rather than that it shall be mutilated I will ask unanimous consent that the whole be printed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I shall take the liberty of publishing the remainder of that letter.

The Clerk read as follows:

MR. BLAINE'S "PARIS MESSAGE."

I would not advise the repeal of the whisky tax. Other considerations than those of financial administration are to be taken into account with regard to whisky. There is a moral side to it. To cheapen the price of whisky is to increase its consumption enormously. There would be no sense in urging the reform wrought by high license in many States if the National Government neutralizes the good effect by making whisky within reach of every one, at 20 cents a gallon. Whisky would be everywhere distilled if the surveillance of the Government were withdrawn by the remission of the tax, and illicit sales could not then be prevented even by a policy as rigorous and searching as that with which Russia pursues the Nihilists. It would destroy high license at once in all the States.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection the formal amendment will be withdrawn. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] to renew it.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Chairman, the wisest men fall into error sometimes, and while I admire the patriotism, the learning, the sound judgment of the experienced statesman from whose letter an extract has just been read, I think that in this case he fell into an error that he would hardly repeat at this time. What is the weight of moral principle involved in the spirit tax? It is but from one-eighth to five-eighths of a cent on the average drink taken in the fashionable club houses and leading saloons of the country. I do not believe that any man who is under the disease of alcoholism or who is cultivating an appetite for alcoholic beverages, who is periling his character and ultimately it may be his sanity, or his life, who is willing to risk home and wife and children and all that he once held dear—and our country, unhappily, constantly presents many tens of thousands of such cases—I do not believe, I say, that such victims can possibly be reclaimed from intemperance by the moral influence of so slight a tax upon a drink of whisky or of the vile decoctions sold under the name of whisky in the gin shops and doggeries of our country.

I think my distinguished and honored friend, Mr. Blaine, was carried away by enthusiasm when he indited that paragraph. For I can not persuade myself that consciousness of the fact that a man who vends a glass of whisky will make a fraction of a penny more than he would have done while the tax existed will tempt any ingenuous youth or discreet man to rush into inebriety. The cause is not on either side sufficient to produce the consequences which Mr. Blaine apprehended from the repeal of the spirit tax. On the other hand, that tax adds heavily to the price of every alcoholic drug prepared for the relief of disease or accident in this country. It adds $1.80 to the cost of every gallon of chloroform, whether used by the dentist or the operating surgeon in capital cases or in relief of patients distracted by pain. It adds $1.80 to the price of every gallon of collodion which is used in so many of the arts.

What is a gallon of collodion? It is a gallon of alcohol less the quantity displaced by a scarcely appreciable weight of gun-cotton. So through the whole range of the arts and sciences and in all the humanities of surgery and medicines, that tax imposes its burden upon the victims of disease and suffering. I think that when our distinguished countryman returns to the United States and finds that the supreme moralists on the subject of temperance are demanding to be released from their participation in the crime of drunkenness by demanding, as prohibitionists, the repeal of the spirit taxes, and that the hundreds of thousands of women constituting the Woman's Christian Temperance Union are praying to man and God to relieve the Government from its criminal participation in profiting by the crimes produced by the spirit tax, he will repudiate this paragraph of his brilliant letter and say to these devoted reformers, I will labor with you in your good work. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BREWER. When Mr. Blaine arrives in this country he will find, I think, that the sentiment of 90 per cent. of the Republicans are in harmony with the views expressed by him in his letter. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, the body of moralists to which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] has referred that is to change the views of Mr. Blaine is no doubt that body who sat in Chicago and adopted the Republican platform which declares in favor of removing all tax from whisky and brandy rather than remove it from the shoes, shirts, and blankets of the people.

Mr. Chairman, the single question before this committee now is, shall we remove all tax from brandy made of certain fruits? The objection given to this by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] is a sufficient reason why it should not be done. As he has shown, the removal of this tax would encourage illicit distillation and make difficult or impossible its detection.

The repeal of this tax would principally benefit the "moonshiner" and the brandy drinker. My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. SOWDEN] should have added these two classes to the list which he says the repeal would benefit.

But, Mr. Chairman, my objection to this amendment is deeper and more radical even than that suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN].

This Government must each year raise a very large sum for revenue, and the question is, shall we abate the sum collected on fruit brandy and add it to the tax on the necessaries and comforts of the people?

When the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SOWDEN] affirms that we do not need this tax he must mean to be understood merely that we can collect the revenue from something else.

It can not be pretended that this amendment if adopted would lessen the manufacture of brandy. Its necessary tendency would, on the contrary, be to encourage and increase it, and as brandy is a luxury or worse, it is fit that it should bear a heavy percentage of the burdens of the Government. This is in accordance with the theory and practice of most enlightened nations. It would be strange indeed if those things necessary to the comfort—even to the existence—of the people should be unduly taxed and whisky and brandy be freed from any duty or burden. I believe it may be safely affirmed that except by the high-tariff monopolists of this country or their representatives no such position has ever been taken by legislators.

This new doctrine is in accordance with that plank of the Chicago platform that declares in favor of the entire repeal of the internal taxes (on whisky and brandy) rather than surrender in any degree the power to highly tax the common necessaries of life.

Justice and morality cry out against such a policy.

Mr. MILLIKEN rose.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I should like the committee to come to some agreement as to the length of time this debate is to run.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I will be through in one minute.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I suggest that it be extended ten minutes, five minutes on each side.

Mr. KERR. I object.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Mr. Chairman, my friend from North Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON] and my other friend from North Carolina [Mr. MCCLAMMY] to-day cry out, where is the Republican party on this question of taking the tax off of alcohol? Why do they not cry out, where is the Democratic party? The proposition offered yesterday received but 27 votes in this committee, and two of those were my friends from North Carolina.

Now, Mr. Blaine is called in question again. My friend from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] had read an extract from his letter. I have no doubt that extract recites not only what the opinion of Mr. Blaine was when he wrote that letter, but also what his opinion is to-day and what his opinion will be when he arrives in this country. [Applause.]

I know Mr. Blaine. I have the honor of filling his place, not in this Hall, but to sit in the seat he once occupied. I have known him personally for twenty years on the street and in public, and I know he is accustomed to speak deliberately, to speak what he means, and small-sized men are not able to shake him from his belief. [Applause on the Democratic side of the House.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, what do you disclose by bringing out these facts? Why, my friend from Texas [Mr. MILLS], when the question is raised, says that the Republican party was the "whisky party," and called upon us to decide between the taxation of whisky and the taxation of shoes. In the face and eyes of the fact that the very votes taken in this House disclose beyond question that members representing nine-tenths of the men who vote the Republican ticket are opposed to such legislation, yet when you come to a direct question here of free whisky the charge is repeated against the Republican party and the attempt is persisted in to put us in what is very evident to all is a false position on that question.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. The Republican party have put themselves in that position.

Mr. MILLIKEN. And you have a fair share of men on that side of the House—far more, I am convinced, than there are on this side—who are in favor of that proposition as a separate and independent question.

What are the facts? The Republican party says this, and I say it to-day, not that it is in favor of free whisky—you know better than that when you make the charge. If there is a party in this country who wants free whisky, it is our Democratic friends, for they need free whisky more than anybody else in this country. If there is a party in the United States north of Mason and Dixon's line that has stood up against prohibition and against restriction on the tens of thousands of grog shops and saloons, it is our good-natured friends on the other side; and when they attempt to put any party on record as a free-whisky party except themselves, it is simply a slander, and shows that they have got ashamed of their own position and desire somebody else to occupy it.

I repeat, what are the facts? The Republican party say this: that rather than have free trade, rather than have the cheap labor of Europe come in here to destroy our industries, that if it were necessary to reduce the revenues, then they would reduce them on whisky rather than permit the condition of things which a repeal of our tariff laws would bring about, and so would I. And I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the industries of this country, and a fair remuneration for labor, are worth more than anything that has come before Congress or that will come before Congress for its consideration.

Now the great problem has been presented by the President of the United States in his message and by gentlemen on this floor, and that is how to reduce the surplus. You say it must be reduced. Why? Because you allege it is gathered into the Treasury, and is not in circulation amongst the people. But if you have free trade you are going to send the volume of that currency to Europe. Will that relieve the difficulty? It is the protective tariff which put the great bulk of that currency into the Treasury. And a gentleman from California showed the other day in his speech that notwithstanding that increase in the surplus at the same time the circulating medium had increased, and that increase was steady from month to month. This is because the protective tariff keeps the money at home, furnishing your goods from your own resources by the hands of your own laborers.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, my absence when the amendment offered by my colleague [Mr. JOHNSTON] for the repeal of the internal-revenue system was under consideration, is my excuse for now troubling the House with some general remarks upon the subject of that amendment.

I am, as I said in the course of my remarks submitted to this House during the month of May, in favor of the total repeal of every part and parcel of that odious system, and so are the people of the State which I in part represent here. But anxious as I am for the repeal of this system and the removal of the restrictions which it imposes upon the liberty of the individual citizen and upon the commerce of the country, I recognize the fact, as do many other gentlemen on this side of the House, who agree with me in wishing its abrogation, that under present financial conditions its repeal at this time is not only impracticable but out of the question.

It must be manifest to every mind should the Government surrender the $120,000,000 annually derived from this source, with an annual surplus of less than $70,000,000, there would be a deficit in the Treasury at the end of the present fiscal year of fully $50,000,000.

Of course no party responsible for the legislation of the country can be expected deliberately to provide for a deficit of such proportions, or by cold legal enactment to invite financial disaster. But worse than this, if this system should be totally abolished there would be no room, even to the extent of a penny, for the reduction of the extravagantly high and unjust taxes now imposed by vicious and inequitable tariff laws upon the necessaries of life consumed in every household in the land. When it comes to me, as has now come to me, to choose between cheap whisky and cheaper food and clothes for the masses of the people (which also means larger comforts and better education) do not morality, humanity, and sound policy require that I should make choice in favor of the latter? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

In so choosing, the Democratic party does not abate one iota its opposition to the internal-revenue system nor its fixed determination to release the people from its operation at the earliest possible moment.

I am satisfied when the people have come to understand that this bill removes $24,000,000 of the $30,000,000 of taxes now levied upon tobacco, that it repeals the license taxes, and that it greatly modifies the machinery of the system, effectually providing against many of the vexations and annoyances which have heretofore marked its enforcement, they will accept, if not with satisfaction, at least with good grace the step which it makes in the direction of the repeal of the whole system. [Applause on the Democratic side.] They will accept it as an earnest on the part of the Democratic party that they will repeal the whole system when the opportunity offers.

From the Republican party we have nothing to expect. That party not only inaugurated this system of taxation, after a disuse of more than forty years, but has during the entire period of its supremacy in this country maintained it, with certain exceptions, in favor of capital, banks, manufacturers, and insurance companies.

If the platform of that party, recently adopted at Chicago, upon this subject is stripped of its disguise and subjected to a fair and honest interpretation it will be found to be a declaration against the repeal of this system, as well as a declaration in favor of high-tariff taxation. Fairly interpreted that platform means that the tax upon whisky will never be surrendered so long as that party can prevent it, and then only as a last resort to preserve its unholy system of protective taxes.

On motion of Mr. MCMILLIN, Mr. SIMMONS was allowed to proceed five minutes longer.

Mr. SIMMONS. The reasons which exist and which have been urged with such overpowering force by the Ways and Means Committee against the total repeal of the internal-revenue system can not, I think, with justice, be urged against the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] to remove the tax from cigars, cigarettes, and cheroots, nor against the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SOWDEN] for the repeal of the tax upon fruit brandy.

The revenue at present received by the Government from the taxes imposed upon the articles covered by these amendments amounts to but little over $7,000,000 per annum. This is a comparatively small amount, and I believe it can be surrendered without inconvenience to the Government or perceptibly interfering with the Democratic policy of reducing taxes upon necessaries.

I have been surprised at some of the arguments advanced on both sides of this House against these two amendments. Certain gentlemen of the Ways and Means Committee tell us that there is no way of distinguishing between whisky and brandy, and if the tax is retained upon the one and removed from the other frauds will be rife and the whole system demoralized. I think the gentlemen underrate the delicate taste of our deputy internal-revenue collectors. With the system of detectives, espionage, and surveillance which the Government employs in this system I can not believe that the fraud of substituting whisky for brandy one which will prove too formidable for the Government. If there is no scientific test (and my friend from Tennessee says there is none) for detecting the adulteration of whisky with brandy we may with good reason hope, if the amendment of my friend from Pennsylvania prevails, inventive genius will be stimulated and one will in due time be discovered.

The opposition of our Republican friends to the repeal of the tax on cigars and cigarettes is the same old argument which we have been accustomed to hear from them during the last two months.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. FARQUHAR] informs the House if these taxes are repealed it will ruin certain large factories in his State and throw their employés out of work. How much sameness there is in the arguments of these gentlemen. If we propose to reduce the taxes on imports they tell us it will ruin the industries concerned. If we propose to reduce direct taxes we are again threatened with calamities. Do the gentlemen mean to say that high taxes beget prosperity? Do they mean to say that every industry must be fostered by taxing its product?

I have no doubt the larger manufacturers of cigars and cigarettes are benefited by this tax and that they are loath to give up this advantage. The great whisky rings of the West are likewise, no doubt, benefited by keeping the tax upon the poor man's orchard and suppressing the competition which would be the result of the distillation of the fruits of those orchards, but neither the small manufacturers of cigars and cigarettes nor the producer of the weed out of which they are made, nor the poor man who owns an orchard in the districts of my colleagues and myself are benefited by these taxes.

Let us be done with arguing in favor of these millionaire manufacturers and these great whisky rings and combinations, and let us do for once some sort of justice to the small dealers, who are neither able nor disposed to combine into unlawful trusts or to influence legislation for the advancement of their selfish interests.

I hope both the amendment for the repeal of the tax on cigars, etc., and the amendment for the removal of taxes on fruit brandies will prevail.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MCMILLIN. It is suggested that we make it ten minutes on a side. If that is acceptable I will agree to it and withdraw my motion that the committee rise. If not, after the gentleman from North Carolina concludes, I will ask that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the proposition that debate on the pending section be closed in twenty minutes—ten minutes on each side?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Iowa. I object, unless the time is made fifteen minutes on each side.

Mr. MCMILLIN. We are very anxious to complete the consideration of this bill to-day in Committee of the Whole; but we will accept that proposition with the understanding that debate on the pending paragraph and all amendments thereto shall be closed in thirty minutes—fifteen minutes on a side.

Mr. WARNER. Upon that proposition I do not want more than a minute or two. I wish to offer a substantial amendment when we are through with the pending amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to limiting debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto to thirty minutes?

Mr. CANNON. How is the time to be divided?

The CHAIRMAN. Fifteen minutes upon each side.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] wants five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from New Hampshire for a part of the time.

There was no objection.

Mr. SIMMONS. Now, Mr. Chairman, the observations I have made with regard to the repeal of the entire internal-revenue system do not apply to a repeal of the tax upon tobacco and fruit brandy. That reduction will only amount to about $6,000,000 upon tobacco and $1,000,000 on fruit brandy. It is perfectly consistent with the policy of the Democratic party in the matter of reduction that this small amount of internal revenue should be cut off from the general receipts of the Government. I have been astonished at some of the arguments presented on both sides of this House why this needed reduction should not be made.

What are the reasons urged, Mr. Chairman, that this $6,000,000 of taxes should not be taken off of tobacco, and the restrictions which are to-day fettering and embarrassing that important trade of the country be removed? The gentleman from New York [Mr. FARQUHAR] has just addressed the House upon that subject, and has announced to the House what we have heard announced so often in the consideration of tariff taxation, the general proposition that if this tax is removed it will injure and destroy the business of certain large cigar-manufacturing establishments and their employés. I do not dispute the proposition that this tax is a benefit to the larger cigar and cigarette establishments in this country.

The same argument might be made here in favor of the large whisky establishments of this country. They receive a benefit from this taxation, and both the capitalists engaged in tobacco and the capitalists engaged in whisky are unalterably opposed to any interference with the tax. But that is not true with regard to the small dealers. That is not true with regard to the gentlemen who raise little orchards in the mountain districts represented by my friend Mr. COWLES and my friend Mr. JOHNSTON in North Carolina. They are injured every day of their lives by the imposition of this tax. The small cigar manufacturers in my district are also injured by the imposition of this tax.

What is the argument, Mr. Chairman? When we propose to reduce tariff taxation gentlemen arise over on the other side and say it will ruin the industries of the country. When we propose to reduce internal taxation gentlemen arise on the other side of the House and say it will ruin the industries of the country. Has it come to this, that we can not reduce taxation either upon imports or upon articles upon which the tax is imposed directly without injury? Has the proposition come to be accepted in an American Congress that a high taxation is necessary in order to preserve and protect and save from ruin the industries of this country?

I think it is not true, sir. I think the argument is made simply in behalf of concentrated capital engaged in the manufacture of cigarettes and concentrated capital engaged in the manufacture of whisky. It is against those organizations now combined into trusts that I feel it my duty to speak in the interest of the small dealers both in tobacco and in fruit brandy in my State and in my district. It may be that the removal of the tax upon fruit brandy will lead to frauds upon the legitimate manufacture of whisky; but I deny that the Government is not able, with the system of detectives, espionage, and surveillance which it throws around every man who deals in those articles, to protect the legitimate dealers from the wrongdoings of the illegitimate and fraudulent dealer. And I believe, sir, that if there be no scientific test now by which it may be made known whether a barrel contains whisky or brandy, or a mixture of the two, it would be only necessary to pass this remedial reformatory legislation in order to find a remedy.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

[Mr. PERKINS withholds his remarks for revision. See APPENDIX.]

Mr. SHAW. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the arguments presented here against the internal-revenue system apply rather to the administrative features of the law than to the system itself; and these objectionable features, I submit, can be repealed or modified without repealing the system. The internal tax is a tax imposed not upon the necessaries of life, but it is a tax upon luxuries, a tax which every one may repeal for himself by abstaining from the use of whisky and tobacco. When I see the representatives of that great party which for so many years posed before the people of this country as the party of great moral ideas advocating the removal of the tax on whisky, and thereby the increase of all the evils which flow from the excessive use of that article, it would seem as if that party is willing to sacrifice even the peace and good order of society, and to utterly ignore all its past professions in order to preserve the iniquitous protective system.

I can not believe, Mr. Chairman, that there is a member of this House, aside from some of the Representatives of the Southern States, to whom the administration of this law has made it so obnoxious, who, if it were not for the purpose of wiping out the surplus revenue and thereby preventing a reduction of tariff taxation, would advocate the abolition of this internal system of taxes.

There is another phase of this question to which I beg to call the attention of the House, which is very pertinently expressed by the Secretary of the Treasury when he asks—

Is it the part of statesmanship to give up a revenue so easily collected, to unaccustom our people to its payment, and to do away with all the machinery for its collection, when, unless we are more favored than other nations of the world, there will come a day when it will all be needed?

Mr. Chairman, this need was felt at the beginning of the war of 1812 and expressed by Mr. Dallas, then Secretary of the Treasury, in one of his reports in the following language:

It certainly furnishes a lesson of practical policy that there existed no system by which the internal resources of the country could be brought at once into action when the resources of its external commerce became incompetent to answer the exigencies of the time.

And that is always the case in time of war or disaster. The tariff system is a summer friend; it is only to be relied on in times of prosperity; when adversity overtakes the country it invariably fails. Continuing, the report says:

The existence of such a system would probably have invigorated the early movements of the war; might have preserved the public credit unimpaired, and would have rendered the pecuniary contributions of the people more equal as well as more effective. But owing to the want of such a system, a sudden and almost exclusive resort to the public credit was necessarily adopted as the chief instrument of finance.

This need was again felt in 1861, when millions were added to the cost of the war by the want of a proper internal-revenue system, and similar losses may occur if war should again find the Treasury dependent solely on customs duties for revenue. That risk it is gravely proposed to take in order that the consumers of spirits and tobacco may be freed from a self-imposed tax which burdens no industry and hinders no prosperity.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I have not occupied much of the time of the committee, and would not trespass now upon its attention but for the fact that I have several times listened to the astounding charge from the Democratic side of this House that the Republican party is in favor of free whisky. That charge is not true. Horace Greeley, who was afterward the Democratic candidate for President of the United States, once said in the columns of the New York Tribune that the two leading doctrines of the Democratic party were to love whisky and hate "niggers." It may be that the Democracy has since then become a temperance party, but I have seen nothing to warrant that conclusion. [Laughter.]

Now, I contend that the Republican party, neither in its national platform nor elsewhere, has said or done anything whatever that justifies any Democrat in making the charge that our party is the free-whisky party.

The utterance of the Chicago platform on this question has been utterly misquoted by many who have participated in this debate. The Republicans have not indorsed the idea of "free whisky," but have simply declared for a partial repeal of the internal-revenue tax on intoxicating drinks, as the following plank from their platform will show:

The Republican party would effect all needed reduction of the national revenue by repealing the taxes upon tobacco, which are an annoyance and burden to agriculture, and the tax upon spirits used in the arts and for mechanical purposes, and by such revision of the tariff laws as will tend to check imports of such articles as are produced by our people, the production of which gives employment to our labor, and release from import duties those articles of foreign production (except luxuries), the like of which can not be produced at home. If there shall still remain a larger revenue than is requisite for the wants of the Government, we favor the entire repeal of internal taxes rather than the surrender of any part of our protective system at the joint behest of the whisky trusts and the agents of foreign manufactures.

Mr. Chairman, if the Republican party is a "free whisky" party, then the National Prohibition party of this country and the Woman's Christian Temperance Union are likewise in favor of "free whisky." I want my Democratic friends to listen to the fourth resolution of the National Prohibition platform, which reads as follows:

For the immediate abolition of the internal-revenue system, whereby our National Government is deriving support from our greatest national vice.

I ask my Democratic friends who, doubtless, are looking to the Prohibition party for a little comfort in the coming campaign, whether they are prepared to say here that that party is a "free whisky" party?

Let us now turn to the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. You will find in their platform which they adopted in their last national convention this resolution:

That we advocate the abolition of the internal revenue on alcoholic liquors and tobacco, for the reason that it operates to render more difficult the securing and enforcement of prohibitory laws, and so postpones the day of national deliverance. We also condemn the principle which permits a government to derive revenue from the vices of the people.

And one of the leading officers of that organization has said to me in a private letter:

Our organization is strongly in favor of the abolition of the tax on alcoholic liquors and tobacco.

Again, I ask my Democratic friends whether they are prepared to go before the country and denounce the Woman's Christian Temperance Union as an organization in favor of "free whisky?"

The following official communication from the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of my State will speak for itself, and I commend it to the thoughtful consideration of the Democratic party, which seems so greatly exercised because the Republican party favors the repeal of internal-revenue taxation rather than the overthrow of the tariff laws:

DEAR SIR: In view of the fact that the liquor traffic is wrong, hence no revenue should be received from it either in national or State governments, we, the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of New Hampshire, most earnestly and respectfully ask that you, who represent the people of New Hampshire in the United States Congress, will use your influence to the utmost to have the tax removed. "A public revenue from a public curse is a bribe to the public to perpetuate that curse."

Most respectfully,

Mrs. N. H. KNOX,
President.
Miss C. R. WENDELL,
Corresponding Secretary.
CLARA E. ROWELL,
Recording Secretary.
ABBY E. McINTIRE,
Treasurer.

Hon. J. H. GALLINGER.

Again, Mr. Chairman, I have received at least thirty letters from officers and members of this great organization urging the repeal of the internal-revenue tax on intoxicating drinks. One of them is from the wife of one of the most distinguished ministers of the Gospel in my State, which I will append:

AMHERST, N. H., June 23, 1888.

DEAR SIR: In behalf of our Woman's Christian Temperance Union, I write this asking that you will use your influence for the repeal of the internal-revenue taxes on liquors. We believe it is wrong in principle; that it is a legalizing, so far as the National Government can, a business that is the source of much of our crime and poverty, and a great hinderance to the removal of the traffic from the land.

Should the National Government be a stockholder in such a business?

Yours, sincerely,

MRS. EDWARD AIKEN,
Secretary of Amherst Woman's Christian Temperance Union.

Hon. J. H. GALLINGER.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask our Democratic friends again if they are prepared, on this floor and before the country, to denounce the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of New Hampshire, officered as it is by women whose lives have been devoted to works of Christian benevolence and practical religion, as being in favor of "free whisky" because they are in favor of repealing the taxes upon the manufacture of whisky?

It is certainly a novel thing for the Democratic party to pose as a temperance party. There is nothing in their record to justify this claim. The Republican party has, by its legislative acts, both State and national, proved itself to be the friend of morality and temperance. Its national platform, adopted in Chicago, gives no uncertain sound on this great question, while the Democratic platform has no word of comfort for the temperance men and women of the country. Throughout its entire history the Democratic party has truckled to the saloons, from whence its votes largely come, and it is the height of impudence for them now to charge the Republican party with being in favor of "free whisky," while they are opposed to it. "Satan rebuking sin" is a mild exhibition of hypocrisy compared with the assumptions of the Democratic side of this House on this question.

Mr. Chairman, I stand by the Republican platform. I stand for the repeal of the internal-revenue tax rather than the destruction of the tariff system, which is fundamental Republican doctrine.

On that issue the Republican party can safely go to the country, notwithstanding the cry of "free whisky" by the Democracy, and on that issue the election of Harrison and Morton as President and Vice-President is a moral certainty. [Applause on the Republican side. Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. KERR. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say in regard to this matter of abolition of the internal-revenue system that the Democratic party was pledged to that measure four years ago. Why do they not keep that pledge to-day? The best reason is that they have all the internal-revenue offices. They have perhaps several thousand of them scattered all over the country, so that if they abolish the internal-revenue system they will lose the patronage of those appointments.

Mr. MACDONALD. And that is one of the reasons why you are in favor of the repeal of the internal-revenue system, because you do not have the appointment of those officers.

Mr. KERR. I have been in favor of the abolition of the internal-revenue system all the time.

The distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] said a few days ago that he was in favor of getting rid of the internal-revenue system, and he read extracts from speeches which he had made and in which he had expressed himself in favor of the repeal of the entire system. Let me ask why, when he was formerly in favor of repeal, he is not in favor of it to-day?

They say you can not do it with safety to the Government; that they need the money. I ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] whether there is not now a surplus of $125,000,000 in the Treasury, and whether there is likely to be a deficiency of more than $30,000,000 a year if you took off all the internal-revenue taxes. If you take every dollar of the internal-revenue tax of $125,000,000 it will take four years under the present system to consume the present surplus.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to reserve one minute of my time in order to give it to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WARNER].

If all of this surplus of $125,000,000 were, by the repeal of the internal-revenue taxes, allowed to go back into the pockets of the people in the United States in the next four years nothing would do more to advance the prosperity of the country. It would be a reversal of the policy of hoarding and contraction that has been pursued by this Administration since it came into power.

I ask you gentlemen on the other side of the House why the Democratic party did not keep the pledges it made to the country four years ago? Were you in favor of free whisky then because you were in favor of the abolition of the internal-revenue system? All of the Republican States of the North and West are either for Prohibition or high license coupled with local restriction. They are in sympathy, Mr. Chairman, with the movement on the part of the people to restrain and prohibit the use of alcoholic liquors as a beverage. I sympathize with them in that movement, and therefore I favor the abolition of the internal-revenue taxes on liquors, which it is sought to make a permanent source of revenue.

As I have already stated, I will now yield one minute of my time to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WARNER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri desires to offer an amendment and to reserve the one minute of time yielded to him for the purpose of explaining it. If there be no objection he will be permitted to do so.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, coming back to the point involved in the pending amendment, I can only repeat what has been so well said by my colleague from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN], that the committee in charge of this bill would have been willing, for some reasons, to report in favor of the repeal of the tax upon fruit brandies, or at least for a diminution of that tax, but after a careful consideration of the question and a study of it with reference to practical legislation, they found themselves unable to devise any plan by which they could release this tax and save the tax upon whisky, with which they were unwilling to interfere.

No plan could be suggested by the Department charged with the collection of this tax, nor was any feasible plan ever offered by those who are most anxious for the repeal. Moreover, it is a much larger subject in its possibilities than appears upon its face. It is true, the tax collected to-day is not a very large one. It is a little over $1,200,000, a sum whose release would make no material difference so far as the revenues of the country are concerned. But when we take into consideration the possibilities of grape production in California and elsewhere, and the possibilities of the apple product in New York and in other parts of the country in the event of the release of this tax, it will be clearly seen that the question is one of much greater magnitude than would be indicated at the first glance.

Now, sir, I have been much interested in the efforts on the other side of the House to reach a proper understanding of the position their party holds to-day as to the repeal of the internal-revenue system, and particularly as to the release of the tax upon whisky and brandy, in view of the utterances of their last platform. This seems to have been a subject of infinite trouble and perplexity to our friends ever since their convention at Chicago. The actual fact is, Mr. Chairman, that the Republican party got drunk on the Oregon election, and the Chicago platform is the product of their "Dutch courage." [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] When that courage evaporates they come back to this House, and spend almost a week in endeavoring to scamper down from that platform, and in trying to prove that it does not mean what in black and white it clearly does mean. [Laughter.]

I rejoiced, sir, with my venerable friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY]. When I read the utterances of his party at Chicago I congratulated him upon the fact that they had finally moved up to his position; and told him then what I say to you to-day, that the nomination of General Harrison or of anybody else on that platform save and except the gentleman from Pennsylvania himself was a plain non sequiter. [Laughter.] And I rejoiced that after years of waiting he could have one single day at least, when, looking to the right and to the left, he could find his party squarely dressed and in line with the advanced position he himself has been holding in this House for the last ten or fifteen years, sometimes almost "solitary and alone" so far as his party associates are concerned.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Chairman, no one disputes the fact that all internal taxes are paid by our own citizens. They are only justified on the ground that the Government needs the money, or in some exceptional cases to prevent frauds that it is for the best interest of society that some things like oleomargarine should be inspected. It is a form of tax not popular with our people, a necessity in time of war, but should be removed so far as possible in time of peace.

It is now imposed alone on tobacco and spirits. It ought at once to be removed entirely from tobacco, and as soon as we can do without the money and have paid our debts, it ought to a large extent at least be removed from spirits. By far the larger part of alcohol is used in manufactures and chemicals; the tax should first be removed from this part of the product the same as is done in most European countries. The tax on all other classes of spirits might after this be largely reduced. As it is now the high tax is a great advantage to the whisky trust. It would perhaps be an advantage to the orderly control of the business if it was kept under the inspection of Government by a small tax.

It has often been asserted in this debate that a removal of the tax on spirits is in the interest of free whisky and against the interest of temperance. There is no reason or truth in this charge. The most active temperance workers do not believe it. For the purpose of showing that no question of temperance is involved in the repeal of the internal taxes, I ask to have the following read:

The Clerk read as follows:

REPEAL OF INTERNAL-REVENUE TAX ON ALCOHOLIC LIQUORS.

[Extract from a paper prepared by Miss Frances E. Willard, president National Woman's Christian Temperance Union, in favor of the repeal, and published in The White Ribbon for February, 1888.]

The Woman's Christian Temperance Union has desired this long and earnestly. Our earliest resolution on the subject was adopted without a dissenting voice at the national convention in Louisville, 1882, and reads as follows:

"The Woman's National Christian Temperance Union desires to express its earnest sympathy with the movement favoring the total abolition of the internal-revenue taxes on all alcoholic beverages at present collected by the National Government, as we believe that the taxation of this business is wrong in principle, an outrage on the moral sentiment of the country, a quasi indorsement of a pernicious traffic, a legalizing, so far as the National Government can, of a business that is the source of most of our crime and poverty, and a great hindrance in the way of the removal of the traffic and its attendant evils out of the land.

"We further believe that this revenue is not needed by the Government, and that the large surplus that it brings into the Treasury is a standing menace to honesty, and a fruitful source of, if not an invitation to, corruption. For these reasons we earnestly urge the abolition of these taxes, and we invite the co-operation of all classes to this end. It is hereby ordered that a copy of the above, properly signed by the president and secretary of this convention, be forwarded to Congress, and that copies be furnished organizations in the country interested, with a request that they co-operate with us in this matter."

Our latest resolution on this subject was unanimously adopted at the Nashville convention in November, 1887, all of the States excepting Nevada and five of the Territories being represented:

"Resolved, That we advocate the abolition of the internal revenue on alcoholic liquors for the reason that it operates to render more difficult the securing and enforcement of prohibitory laws, and so postpones the day of national deliverance."

In my annual address before this convention the following passage occurs:

"I hope we shall distinctly declare ourselves in favor of removing the internal-revenue tax from all intoxicating liquors. It is a covenant with hell and a compact with damnation. To-day it stands as the strongest bulwark between the liquor traffic and annihilation. We want no monopolies in sin, least of all that the National Government should be the largest stockholder, getting 90 cents on every gallon of whisky and 93 cents, in round numbers, on every keg of beer. The amount of tax is about equal to the annual surplus in the United States Treasury; let both be wiped out together. I hope this may be one of our campaign battle-cries: 'Down with the tax that ties the nation tight to the vampire that is sucking out its blood.'"

Listen to Senator FRYE, of Maine, a stanch temperance man and Republican. He says:

"There is not a distiller or liquor-seller who wants the tax taken off. The pretended moral argument—largely advanced by brewers, saloon-keepers, and free-traders—that the removal of the tax would increase the consumption by making whisky cheaper to the drinker is absurd. A careful estimate shows that the reduction on an ordinary glass of whisky after it has been doctored and reduced for the drinker would not exceed seven-eighths of a cent."

Listen to that stanch Democrat, General "JOE" BROWN, United States Senator:

"I should think that the prohibitionists would very naturally desire the repeal of the revenue laws by the Congress of the United States, so as to leave the whole question under the control of the States, so that in case the prohibitionists should get the control of a State there would be no embarrassment growing out of license to distill and sell granted by the Government of the United States, as is now the case. Remove all Federal interference with the manufacture and vending of ardent spirits and you will have the matter entirely within the hands of the States, where a majority of the people of each State can control it. If the prohibitionists are right and the majority of the people are with them, then they could ask nothing better than for the Government of the United States to take its hands off this traffic and leave it entirely under the control of the States."

Listen to the Voice, chief champion of the Prohibition party:

"[Special correspondence.]

"LOUISVILLE, December 24.

"The Voice has obtained interviews with the most prominent representatives of the Kentucky whisky interests regarding the attitude of the manufacturers and wholesale dealers toward the proposed abolition or reduction of the Federal internal-revenue tax on distilled spirits. The whisky men interviewed, with but one exception, opposed abolition of the tax, urging that the tax is a powerful agency for the successful prosecution of the whisky business.

"[Special dispatch.]

"CINCINNATI, December 26.

"The distillers of this great distillery city unanimously agree that the Federal tax on whisky should not be stricken off. For the most part they assign as their reason that without the tax governmental supervision would be impossible, and the distilling would not be done, as heretofore, in great and responsible establishments under the eye of Uncle Sam, but anywhere and everywhere by irresponsible persons. The result, they say, would be deterioration of the distilled product and such other bad effects that there would be general revolt against the trade."

[From the New York Sun.]

The most ambitious and the most powerful of all trusts, the whisky trust, has just declared a dividend of 1½ per cent. This enormous income is directly connected with the maintenance of the internal-revenue system. With that out of the way there would be no whisky trusts of any such importance.

[Clinton B. Fisk.]

I believe that the Internal Revenue Department of the United States should be abolished forthwith, and the National Government no longer remain the chief partner in the distilling and brewing business. The repeal of the internal-revenue taxes on liquors and tobacco is the safest, most practicable and righteous way of reducing the surplus in the United States Treasury.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. The Republican party claim the credit of large and repeated reductions of internal taxation. That the exact facts may be a matter of record and easy of access I ask leave to have printed the letter from Mr. Miller, Commissioner of Internal Revenue, to Speaker CARLISLE.

During the years in which these reductions were being made no burden has been removed from our tariff taxation, and the increased rates of duties imposed because of these internal taxes have not been removed, though the internal tax has been repealed.

And as this history given in this letter is carefully studied it will be perceived that as a rule these reductions removed burdens from capital and wealth, and rendered more improbable and difficult a revision of the tariff and a reduction of tariff taxation, and more firmly riveted the present system of excessive protective duties upon the tax-payers and consumers.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, May 2, 1888.

SIR: I have the honor to submit herewith, in compliance with your request, a statement of the amount of internal taxes abolished under the several acts of legislation from July 13, 1866, when the first act was passed "to reduce internal taxation," to March 3, 1883, the date of the last act to reduce such taxation, as shown—

First. By ascertaining the differences, when practicable, between the receipts from the several sources affected by the legislation for the years in which the acts were passed, at the rates of tax in force immediately prior to the passage of the acts, and the receipts that the new rates imposed by these acts would have yielded for the same years had they been in force.

Second. When, from want of necessary data, the foregoing method is impracticable, by giving the differences in the receipts for the years immediately preceding and following the years in which the acts were passed effecting the reduction or repeal of said taxes, except in cases where an act had not gone into full operation the first year after its passage, when the receipts for the next succeeding year are taken instead of those for the year before it, and Third. In cases where the tax is wholly abolished by giving the largest amount of revenue collected from that source in any year as the measure of reduction.

Taxation under the present internal-revenue system culminated in 1866, the receipts for that year amounting to $310,906,984.17. Under the laws then in force taxes were levied on raw products, upon all manufactures; upon nearly all professions, trades, and occupations, upon the entire receipts of transportation, express, insurance, and telegraph companies, of advertisements, bridges, and toll roads, and of lotteries, theaters, and other places of amusement, upon auction sales and brokers' sales of merchandise, stocks, bonds, foreign exchange, promissory notes, gold and silver bullion and coin (and later upon sales of manufacturers, dealers, liquor dealers, etc.), upon the income of individuals, upon bank profits, dividends, and additions to surplus funds, upon canal, railroad, and turnpike companies' dividends, interest on bonds and additions to surplus funds, upon insurance companies' dividends and additions to surplus funds, and upon the salaries of United States officers and employés, upon articles of luxury kept for use, such as billiard tables, carriages, piano-fortes, and other parlor musical instruments, gold watches, yachts, gold and silver plate, upon nearly every kind of legal instrument, upon promissory notes, bank checks, friction matches and proprietary medicines, upon legacies and successions, upon passports, upon slaughtered cattle, sheep, and swine, and upon the capital, circulation, and deposits of banks, private, State, and national. In a word, every available source of revenue was laid under contribution to pay the interest on the public debt and to meet the other necessary expenses of the Government. This system was probably more far-reaching and comprehensive than any system of taxation ever before devised.

The work of reducing internal taxation began August 1, 1866, and went on more or less rapidly until 1883, when, according to the following statement, taxes to the amount of $320,717,187 per annum had been abolished, and the system relieved of its most burdensome provisions.

TAXES REPEALED UNDER ACTS OF JULY 13, 1866; MARCH 2, 1867; FEBRUARY 3, 1868; MARCH 31, 1868; JULY 20, 1868, AND JULY 14, 1870.

First. Manufactures and products: The largest and most important class of articles taxed during the fiscal year 1866 was that of manufactures and productions. Exclusive of the tax on distilled spirits, fermented liquors, chewing and smoking tobacco, snuff, and cigars it yielded that year $127,230,609. The articles included in it were almost innumerable. One hundred and twenty-five were enumerated in the "schedule of articles subject to tax." One other heading—"manufactures not enumerated"—included the rest. Under this class taxes were duplicated and reduplicated. Among the articles that yielded the largest amount of revenue may be mentioned the raw products—coal, cotton, crude petroleum, and sugar; and the manufactures—boots and shoes, cloths and other fabrics made of cotton, same made of wool, ready-made clothing, illuminating gas, manufactures of iron, oil distilled from crude petroleum, and coal.

Taxes in this class were reduced by acts of July 13, 1866, and March 2, 1867, and were finally abolished by acts of February 3, 1868, March 31, 1868, and July 20, 1868, with the exception of the tax on gas. This was not repealed until August 1, 1872. As a substitute for the tax on manufactures a tax of one-fifth of 1 per cent. was imposed on the sales of manufactures in excess of $5,000 per annum. Largest receipts in 1866; amount, $127,230,609.

Second. Gross receipts: Taxes varying from 1½ to 5 per cent. were imposed on the gross receipts of canal, railroad, steam-boat, express and insurance companies, of advertisements, bridges, ferries, stage coaches, etc. Taxes reduced by acts of July 13, 1866, March 2, 1867, and finally repealed by act of July 14, 1870. Largest receipts in fiscal year 1866; amount, $11,262,430.

Third. Sales: Sales of brokers on merchandise, produce, stocks, bonds, foreign exchange, gold and silver bullion and coin, auction sales, sales of dealers and liquor-dealers over $50,000 per annum were taxed at rates varying from one-twentieth to one-fourth of 1 per cent. up to 1870. Repealed by act of July 14, 1870. Largest receipts in fiscal year 1870; amount, $8,837,395.

Fourth. Special taxes not relating to spirits, beer, and tobacco: An annual tax varying from $5 to $500 was imposed on nearly all professions and occupations. Few reductions were made in these taxes before their repeal. Abolished May 1, 1871, by act of July 14, 1870. Largest receipts in fiscal year 1866; amount, $14,144,418.

Fifth. Income: The tax on incomes from individuals was reduced by acts of March 2, 1867, and July 14, 1870. It expired by limitation December 31, 1871.

The tax of 5 per cent. on dividends and additions to surplus of banks, insurance, railroad, and other corporations was reduced by act of July 14, 1870, to 2½ per cent. and expired by limitation at the same time as the tax on incomes from individuals. Largest receipts in fiscal year 1866: From individuals, $60,547,882; from corporations, $12,434,277; total, $72,982,159.

Sixth. Legacies and successions: No reduction in this class before its repeal by act of July 14, 1870. Largest receipts in fiscal year 1870; amount, $3,091,825.

Seventh. Articles of luxury kept for use: Reduction by act of July 13, 1866; taxes repealed by act of July 14, 1870; largest receipts in fiscal year 1867; amount, $2,116,674.

Eighth. Slaughtered animals: No reduction under this class; repealed by act of July 13, 1866; largest receipts in fiscal year 1866; amount, $1,291,571.

Ninth. Passports: The tax on passports was repealed by act of July 14, 1870; largest receipts in fiscal year 1866; amount, $31,149.

Tenth. Stamp taxes: The stamp tax imposed on promissory notes for a less sum than $100, and on receipts for any sum of money or for the payment of any debt, and the stamp tax imposed on canned and preserved fish were repealed October 1, 1870, by act of July 14, 1870.

Total receipts from stamp taxes for the fiscal year 1870	$16,544,043.00
And for the fiscal year 1872	16,177,321.00
Apparent reduction	366,722.00

Recapitulation of taxes repealed under the foregoing named acts.

Taxes repealed on—	Amount.
Manufactures and products	$127,230,609.00
Gross receipts	11,262,430.00
Sales	8,837,395.00
Special taxes not relating to spirits, tobacco, and beer	14,144,418.00
Income	72,982,159.00
Legacies and successions	3,091,825.00
Articles of luxury kept for use	2,116,674.00
Slaughtered animals	1,291,571.00
Passports	31,149.00
Total abolished	240,988,230.00
Add stamp taxes reduced	366,722.00
And for increase on gas from 1866 to 1872	989,076.00
And for increase on raw cotton from 1866 to 1867	5,359,424.00
Total repealed and reduced	247,703,452.00

The receipts from the tax on gas in 1866 were $1,822,643, and in 1872, the year of largest receipts from this source, $2,831,719, showing an increase in the tax during this time of $989,076. So, also, the receipts from raw cotton in 1866 were $18,409,655, and in 1867, the year when the largest receipts were returned from this source, $23,769,079, showing an increase of $5,359,424 over the receipts of the previous year. The sums then of $989,076 and of $5,359,424 have been added to the total of taxes repealed in accordance with the principle enunciated in paragraph 3, page 3.

The following is a brief synopsis of the leading provisions in the above-named acts that effected this reduction:

First. An act of July 13, 1866: The largest reductions under this act were made on manufactures and products, by the repeal of the provisions in section 5, act of March 3, 1865, which imposed a tax of 20 per cent. on all articles, with few exceptions, enumerated in section 94, act of June 30, 1864, in addition to the rates imposed in that section, and by repealing the tax altogether on certain articles in this class. The rate of tax on gross receipts of telegraph companies was reduced from 5 to 3 per cent., and on auction sales from one-fourth to one-tenth of 1 per cent., and on brokers' sales of merchandise from one-eighth to one-twentieth of 1 per cent. The tax of one-twentieth of 1 per cent. on brokers' sales of stocks, bonds, foreign exchange, promissory notes, or other securities, and of one-tenth of 1 per cent. on sales of gold and silver bullion and coin was reduced to one one-hundredth of 1 per cent., when such sales were made by a broker, bank, or banker who had paid a special tax as such. The tax was repealed on the gross receipts of railroad and other companies for transportation of freight, on slaughtered animals, on carriages valued at $300 and less, on piano-fortes and other parlor musical instruments, and on yachts, pleasure and racing boats kept for use.

Second. Act of March 2, 1867: The list of articles added to the free-list by act of July 13, 1866, was considerably increased by this act. The tax was repealed on the gross receipts of advertisements and toll roads, and was reduced on the gross receipts of bridges and ferries from 3 to 2½ per cent. A few additional taxes were imposed on sales.

The income tax of individuals was reduced by raising the exemption from $600 to $1,000, and by imposing a uniform rate of 5 per cent. on all taxable incomes over that amount, in lieu of the rates 5 per cent. on incomes over $600 and not over $5,000, and 10 per cent. on incomes over $5,000, an excess of $5,000 imposed by act of March 3, 1865.

Third. Act of February 3, 1868: By this act the tax on cotton grown in the United States after the year 1867 was repealed.

Fourth. Act of March 31, 1868: All taxes on manufactures and productions, except distilled spirits, fermented liquors, cigars, cigarettes, snuff, chewing and smoking tobacco, not before repealed, were abolished from the passage of this act, except the tax on gas, and mineral oils distilled from coal and crude petroleum. In lieu of these taxes repealed, however, a tax of one-fifth of 1 per cent. was imposed on manufacturers' sales in excess of $5,000 per annum.

Fifth. Act of July 2, 1868: The remainder of the tax on mineral oil distilled from crude petroleum, coal, etc., which was reduced one half by the act of March 31, 1868, was repealed by this act.

Sixth. Act of July 14, 1870: By the provisions of this act tax was repealed on special taxes not relating to spirits, fermented liquors, and tobacco, on gross receipts, sales, legacies, and successions, articles of luxury kept for use, not before abolished, and on passports.

The tax on income from individuals was reduced by raising the exemption from $1,000 to $2,000, and by imposing a tax of 2½ per cent. on all taxable incomes over $2,000, in place of 5 per cent. on all taxable incomes over $1,000, under act of March 2, 1867. This act also reduced the tax from 5 to 2½ per cent. on the dividends and additions to surplus funds of banks, canal, insurance, railroad, and turnpike companies, and on the interest on bonds of canal, railroad, and turnpike companies, and provided that the income tax should be levied and collected annually for the years 1870 and 1871, and no longer. It also reduced the stamp tax. (See paragraph 10, page 12.)

The amount of reduction in the several classes named under each of the foregoing acts can not be exactly determined for lack of necessary data in the returns. The largest receipts for any one year have, therefore, been taken as the measure of reduction.

Act of July 20, 1868, as amended by act of April 10, 1869: Among the more important provisions of this act were those reducing the rates of tax on distilled spirits from $2 to 50 cents per gallon, modifying the special taxes of distillers, and imposing a capacity tax on their distilleries and a tax of $4 per barrel on the annual production of spirits in excess of 100 barrels by each distiller.

Under these changes in the law the quantities of distilled spirits returned for taxation increased from 7,224,809 gallons in 1868 to 62,092,417 gallons in 1869, and 78,490,198 gallons in 1870, and the receipts from $18,655,631 in 1868 to $45,071,231, in 1869, and $55,606,094 in 1870.

The most important changes made in the rates of tax on tobacco and snuff were the reduction of the tax on snuff and the finer grades of chewing and smoking tobacco, constituting about two-thirds of the quantity of tobacco taxed, from 40 to 32 cents per pound, and the imposition of a tax of one-fifth of 1 per cent. on sales of cigars over $5,000 per annum, of manufactured tobacco over $1,000 per annum, of leaf-tobacco over $10,000 per annum, and on the excess over $5,000 of the penal sum of bonds of manufacturers of tobacco.

Under the operation of these and other modifications in the law the quantities of manufactured tobacco and snuff returned for taxation increased from 46,764,150 pounds in 1868 to 64,305,026 pounds in 1869, and 90,288,082 pounds in 1870, and the receipts from all sources relating to tobacco from $18,730,095 in 1868 to $23,430,708 in 1869, and $31,350,708 in 1870.

This act provided that the tax on distilled spirits, snuff, chewing and smoking tobacco should be paid by stamps. The tax on distilled spirits was accordingly first paid by stamps November 1, 1868, and on manufactured tobacco and snuff November 23, 1868.

Act of June 6, 1872: Under spirits this act repealed the special tax of distillers, the capacity or per diem tax on their distilleries, and the tax of $4 per barrel on every barrel produced by any distiller over 100 barrels a year, but increased the rate of tax per gallon from 50 to 70 cents. These changes were not probably made to affect the revenue from spirits, but to make the tax less burdensome to distillers.

The changes made by this act in the rates of tax on tobacco were the substitution of a uniform rate of 20 cents per pound on all chewing and smoking tobacco for the two rates, 16 and 32 cents, imposed by act of July 20, 1868, the repeal of the tax on sales of cigars over $5,000 per annum, of manufactured tobacco over $1,000 per annum, of leaf-tobacco over $10,000 per annum, and on excess of $5,000 of the penal sum of bonds of manufacturers of tobacco, and the imposition of a special tax on retail dealers in leaf-tobacco, and on peddlers of tobacco.

Estimated reduction under tobacco: The quantity of chewing and smoking tobacco returned for taxation during the fiscal year 1872 was 93,655,905 pounds. The actual receipts from this tobacco at 16 and 32 cents per pound imposed by act of July 20, 1868, were:

At 32 cents	$18,177,476.77
At 16 cents	5,896,206.33
Total	24,073,683.10
Estimated receipts on 93,655,905 pounds at 20 cents	18,731,181.00
Showing a reduction of	5,342,502.10
Add for receipts from sales of cigars, manufactured tobacco, etc., in 1872	363,137.00
Total	5,705,639.10
Deduct receipts of retail dealers in leaf-tobacco and peddlers of tobacco in 1873	58,698.00
Actual reduction in receipts from tobacco	5,646,941.10

This act also repealed all stamp taxes imposed under Schedule B (documentary stamps), act of June 30, 1864, except the 2-cent stamp on bank checks, drafts, or orders. Date of repeal, October 1, 1872. The receipts for the first entire fiscal year after the date of repeal were those for 1874.

Receipts from stamp taxes in 1872	$16,177,321
Receipts from stamp taxes in 1874	6,136,845
Showing a reduction of	10,040,476

This act raised the exemption on all sums deposited in savings banks, etc., in the name of one person from $500 to $2,000, and exempted certain borrowed capital. The annual reduction in the receipts from bank capital and deposits in consequence of these changes in the law was, as appears from a comparison of the receipts from them in 1872 and 1873, $873,111.

Amount of tax returned on bank capital and deposits:

In fiscal year 1872	4,619,364
In fiscal year 1873	3,746,253
Reduction	873,111

The tax on illuminating gas was repealed by this act.

Amount of reduction:

On the stamp tax	$10,040,476
On bank capital and deposits	873,111
On tobacco	5,646,941
By the repeal of the tax on gas (see page 14)
Total, exclusive of gas	16,560,528

Act of March 1, 1879: This act imposed a uniform rate of 16 cents per pound on all snuff, chewing and smoking tobacco in lieu of 32 cents per pound imposed on snuff by act of July 20, 1868, and 24 cents per pound on chewing and smoking tobacco imposed by act of March 3, 1875. This act took effect May 1, 1879, hence the greater part of the receipts for the last two months of the fiscal year 1879 was collected at the new rates of tax.

The total quantity of manufactured tobacco and snuff returned for taxation during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1879, was 120,398,458 pounds, as follows:

	Pounds.	Pounds.
Snuff at 32 cents	2,215,111

Act of May 28, 1880: This act abolished warehouse, rectifiers', wholesale liquor dealers', special bonded warehouse and imported spirit stamps, and the provision for the payment of 5 per cent. interest under joint resolution of March 28, 1878, on the tax upon spirits that had remained in warehouse more than one year, and provided certain allowances for leakage in packages of spirits when they were withdrawn from warehouse.

The receipts from the sale of the above-named stamps in 1880 were:

Interest amounted to	$330,689
Leakage, taking the average	158,994
Allowed for 1881, 1882 and 1883	1,300,144
Total	$1,789,827

Act of March 3, 1883: This act reduced the tax on tobacco and repealed the stamp-tax on checks, friction-matches, patent medicines, etc., and the tax on the capital and deposits of all banks and bankers, private, State, and National.

Under tobacco, the tax on cigars was reduced from $6 to $3 per thousand, on cigarettes from $1.75 to 50 cents per thousand, and on snuff, chewing, and smoking tobacco from 16 to 8 cents per pound, and the special taxes of manufacturers of and dealers in tobacco were reduced on an average nearly 50 per cent.

Respectfully, yours,

JOS. S. MILLER, Commissioner.

Hon. JOHN G. CARLISLE,
Speaker of the House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, in the discussion of the tariff bill now pending before the House there seems to be a determined purpose on the part of our Republican friends to augment the importance of our home market and to disparage and belittle our export trade with foreign nations. It is evident from the utterances of their leading men that the object is to educate, if possible, the people into the belief that the prosperity of our agricultural and mechanical industries depends almost exclusively upon our home market, and that the tariff should be so high as to give us exclusive control of the same, even though it annihilates our foreign trade, which they say amounts to very little in any event. In pursuance of this object, they are continually making statements professing to show the relative quantities of the agricultural productions annually disposed of in the home and foreign markets; and the statements thus made are at variance with the truth and calculated to mislead. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PUGSLEY], in his speech the other day on the tariff, while speaking of the farmers, said:

They know that if the mere 6 per cent. of their produce that is sold abroad and comes in competition with the cheaper labor and cheaper lands decreases the price of the 94 per cent. sold at home, it would be well for them if the fostering hand of the Government was still further extended to develop other manufactories that can be carried on successfully in the country, so that the increased number of employés and consumers would require the 6 per cent. now exported and relieve the farmers from that unworthy competition.

This is in harmony with the sentiments expressed by all the leading Republicans in the country, from Blaine and JOHN SHERMAN down to the foot of the list, and the method by which our Republican friends propose to relieve the farmers from the depression under which the agricultural industry is now languishing, notwithstanding we have been living under a high protective tariff for the last twenty-seven years.

What is the relief proposed for the farmer? High taxation, until manufactories are so increased in this country that they will employ enough men to consume at home all the agricultural productions of this the greatest producing country in the world—a proposition which appears so absurd, when it is investigated, that it is difficult to comprehend how any reasonable man could for a moment entertain it. Why, Mr. Chairman, what are the facts in the case? The annual export of agricultural products from this country is 15 per cent. of the entire production, instead of 6 per cent., as the gentleman from Ohio has stated, and more than 26 per cent. of what the farmers have left for the market after they have deducted from the whole production what they consume themselves. A vast difference between 26 per cent. and 6 per cent., as our Republican friends are in the habit of stating it.

Therefore, our Republican friends, in order to make their theory work, will have to provide a home market, not for 6 per cent. of our agricultural products, as they have stated, but for more than 26 per cent., or more than one-fourth of all the farmers raise for market; which is impossible to accomplish, and the sooner the insane idea is abandoned the better it will be for the country. Lest the correctness of this statement may be questioned, we will give the figures and calculations that will settle the question beyond peradventure. The annual value of our agricultural productions is $3,500,000,000, and we exported of our agricultural products in 1887 $523,000,000, which deducted from the whole amount produced leaves a balance of $2,977,000,000 to be consumed at home. Hence it will be seen at a glance that the whole amount of farm products consumed at home is only five and one-half times greater than the amount exported and sold abroad, instead of being sixteen-fold greater, as Senator SHERMAN stated in his speech to the Home Market Club in Boston, in February last.

But the $2,977,000,000 is consumed by 60,000,000 people, one-half of whom are the farmers and their families, who together are estimated to form half our population; hence one-half of the $2,977,000,000, to wit, $1,488,500,000, will be consumed by the agriculturists themselves, and the other half, to wit, $1,488,500,000, is left to the farmers to supply the home market, and which constitute the whole amount they sell in the home market. It thus appears that the amount the farmers sell in the home market is $121,500,000, less than three times as great as the quantity they export and sell in a foreign market. The $523,000,000 of farm products that were exported and sold in a foreign market, 1887, at the rate we consume at home, will supply the demands of 10,000,000 people in such products. This is the trade our Republican friends say is but a bagatelle, and ask the farmers, who compose 30,000,000 of our population, to surrender in the interest of a few hundred manufacturers, who employ, all told, not to exceed 1,500,000 men, many of whom have been imported under contract from foreign countries and are to return to their homes when the contract expires.

If it be true, as my Republican friend from Ohio says it is, that that portion of the farmers' products exported abroad and sold in a foreign market in competition with the pauper labor of Europe and other countries decreases the price of that portion sold at home (which statement I do not contradict), then I challenge any gentleman upon the floor of this House to show how it is possible for a high protective tariff to protect the farmer so long as he has to export any portion of his product to be sold in competition with such pauper labor. If the American farmer can afford to go 3,000 miles with his product, pay storage, freightage, insurance, and commission thereon, and sell in competition with the cheaper labor and cheaper lands of the Old World, and if these foreign producers, with the product of their pauper labor, can not drive the product of the American farmer out of their own markets at home, what earthly chance would they have to compete with the American farmer in his home market from three to five thousand miles away?

No sane man would presume they would have any. Hence this clamor for a home market does not come from the farmer, nor from the laborer, but from the owners of a few hundred tariff-protected industries. The farmers know that all they produce in excess of what is consumed at home has to be exported and sold in a foreign market; they know that in 1887 they produced in excess of the home demand and exported $523,000,000, enough to feed 10,000,000 people; they know that in 1882 they produced in excess of the home demand and exported more than $800,000,000 which is more than enough to feed 15,000,000 people; they know that no tariff however high could supply such a vast number of people at home, to consume so great a surplus as they now export; they know that their sole dependence for a market for this vast surplus is abroad; they know that the more extended the foreign market the better it is for them, and the more encouragement they have to increase their labor and productions; they know that the effect of a high protective tariff is to restrict the foreign market directly to the injury of every farmer in the country; they know that the United States last year sold to Mexico, our next-door neighbor, only $7,000,000 of her productions, while England, 3,000 miles away, sold to Mexico of her productions $750,000,000, more than one hundred times as much as the United States; they know, too, that under this high protective tariff England has monopolized the trade of South America and all the islands adjacent thereto, comprising over 50,000,000 of people, showing conclusively the injurious effect a high protective tariff has upon our foreign trade. England exports annually to Mexico and South America alone more than twice the amount the United States exports to all the world. The farmers know their financial condition has been worse during the last ten years than during any like period in the last forty years. They know that at no time in the last forty years was there so little to encourage the farmer as now; they know that the farmers can not get along without the foreign market, but that the tariff-protected manufacturers can, so long as a high tariff wards off foreign competition and enables them, by combining together, to limit their production to the consuming capacity of the home market, and fix their own price upon their goods, which the farmers, laborers, and artisans are compelled to pay, because the tariff will not permit them to buy abroad; they know that most of the protected industries can supply the demand in the home market for their product and remain idle one-half the time; they know that these privileges are enjoyed by this favored class at the expense of the great body of the people; they know that the owners of the tariff-protected industries are willing to be restricted to the home market, because the tariff gives them the monopoly of the same, and compels the farmers, laborers, and all other consumers to purchase in it.

The tariff-protected industries can limit their productions, and do, to the consuming capacity of the home market, and are thus entirely independent of the foreign markets; hence its decline does not affect them. But not so with the farmers; 9,000,000 men can not combine to limit their productions, and more than one-fourth of what they raise for sale has to seek a foreign market. Therefore, that same legislation which gives and secures to the owners of the tariff-protected industries a monopoly of the home market in which they dispose of all their productions, tends to destroy and emasculate the foreign market in which the farmers are compelled to dispose of their surplus products. It is said that the agriculturists represent one-half our population, or 30,000,000 people. Now the question arises, shall this 30,000,000 people who represent the great farming interest of this country be sacrificed in the interest of a few hundred owners of tariff-protected industries? Let the issue come; the sooner the better.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. O'DONNELL] in his eloquent speech the other day, in speaking of our national greatness, said:

The United States of America now stands in the front rank of the nations of the world—leads them all; the aggregate of its industries is larger than that of any other people. Mulhall, acknowledged to be the most eminent of all statisticians, in his Dictionary of Statistics, places the industries of the United States at $11,405,000,000 per annum, which is $2,205,000,000 greater than the United Kingdom of Great Britain; nearly double those of France; almost twice as large as those of Germany; nearly three times as large as those of Russia, and very nearly equal to the combined industries of Austria, Italy, Spain, Belgium, Holland, Australia, Canada, Sweden, and Norway. These figures photograph the mightiness of this nation, and fix its rank in the industrial world.

Mr. Chairman, this is true; this is a mighty nation; its annual production is equal to $190 for every man, woman, and child under the flag, while the annual productions of Europe amount to less than $40 per capita, and that of the whole world outside of the United States amount to less than $30 per capita, yet in the very face of these facts our Republican friends insist that the productive powers of this mighty Government shall be limited to the consuming capacity of 60,000,000 people when with proper encouragement it can produce enough for 400,000,000. But it is said we can not get other nations to buy from us. Why not? It is said we only sell $7,000,000 annually to Mexico as an evidence that foreign countries will not buy from us; yet Mexico does buy annually from England $750,000,000, being more than one hundred times as much as it buys from the United States.

The same is true with South America and all other countries that buy annually from England near $2,000,000,000. Why should we confine our producers to a home market of only 60,000,000 people, while England furnishes to the markets of the world annually $2,000,000,000 of her productions? The truth is, England sells because she holds out inducements which the United States withholds. Hence the languishing condition of industries. While the annual productions of the United States are one-fifth greater than the annual production of England, yet England's export trade is annually five times greater than the export trade of the United States. Now, if we had an export trade equal to that of England, there would not be an idle laborer in the country and new life would be imparted to all the industries of the land.

The CHAIRMAN. The debate upon the pending amendment is exhausted, but it is in order to move additional amendments to be voted upon without debate.

Mr. COWLES. I submit the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the tax on brandy distilled from apples or peaches be, and the same is hereby, repealed, and distillers of brandy made from apples or peaches are hereby exempt from any provisions of law restricting or limiting the manufacture or sale of distilled spirits except as hereinafter provided. That the places where such brandy is kept for sale, whether licensed or unlicensed, and the distilleries whereat such brandy is made, or the places whereat it is stored, as well as the vehicles used for its transportation, shall at all times, under provisions and restrictions of existing laws, be open to examination and search by the properly constituted authorities, and that it shall be unlawful for any person to mix or mingle whisky or other distilled spirits with brandy, or to change by any means whatsoever the flavor or other qualities of any whisky or other distilled spirits so as to cause it to resemble in any respect brandy, with intent to evade the payment of the tax on such mixture or on the whisky or other distilled spirits so intermixed or changed in flavor, taste, or other quality, and any person or persons who shall be duly convicted thereof shall in each and every case be punished by fine or imprisonment, one or both, in the discretion of the court; and it shall furthermore be unlawful for any person to use the license hereby given for the manufacture and sale of brandy distilled from apples and peaches in any way to evade the tax penalties and punishments imposed by law in respect to whisky and other distilled spirits, and any person so offending shall be punished by fine or imprisonment, one or both, in the discretion of the court. Any and all property now liable to forfeiture by reason of violations of internal-revenue laws involved in any violation of this act shall, under provision of existing law, be forfeited to the United States.

Mr. COWLES. I simply desire to state that this amendment is an answer to the request of gentlemen from the Ways and Means Committee. I think it is so guarded that even the most particular can find no objection to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will entertain the amendment proposed by the gentleman as a substitute for the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SOWDEN], which is now pending as an additional section.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 12, noes 74.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. COWLES. Seventy-one Democrats and three Republicans against it. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now report the amendment pending, proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SOWDEN] as an additional section, to be numbered 27.

The amendment was again read, as follows:

Amend by inserting the following after section 26, and designating same as section 27:

"That all laws imposing any internal-revenue taxes on spirits distilled from apples, peaches, and other fruits, are hereby repealed, and that on all original and unbroken hogsheads, barrels, or kegs of such spirits held by manufacturers or dealers at the time this act shall go into effect, upon which the tax has been paid, there shall be allowed a drawback or rebate of the full amount of the tax so paid; but the same shall not apply in any case where the claim has not been ascertained or presented within ninety days following the date of the repeal. It shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, to adopt such rules and regulations and to prescribe and furnish such blanks and forms as may be necessary to carry this section into effect."

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 44, noes 79.

Mr. SOWDEN. I demand tellers.

Tellers were refused, 12 members only voting therefor.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now report the next section.

Mr. WARNER. I wish to offer an amendment to this section before passing from it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WARNER] desires to offer an amendment to the pending section, and will be entitled to one minute reserved by him to explain it.

The amendment of Mr. WARNER was read, as follows:

Insert, after the word "manufacture," in line 13 of section 26, the following:

"That on and after the 1st day of January, 1889, wholesale dealers in oleomargarine shall pay a special tax of $10 annually.

"That on and after the 1st day of January, 1889, retail dealers in oleomargarine shall pay a special tax of $5 annually."

Mr. WARNER. It is known, Mr. Chairman, that on the last day of the first session of the last Congress we passed a law for the purpose of raising revenue when it was admitted that we did not want any more revenue, and when the purpose of the then dominant party was to decrease the revenues. They imposed a specific tax upon the manufacturers of oleomargarine of $600. That I leave as it is. In addition to that tax they fixed a specific tax on the wholesale dealer of $480, and it has been held that every man who sells a package of 10 pounds or over at any one time is a wholesale dealer. It also fixed a special tax upon the retail dealers of $48. This amendment, Mr. Chairman, leaves the tax of 2 cents a pound upon oleomargarine; leaves the tax upon the manufacturer of oleomargarine at $600, and simply permits the small retail dealers throughout the country to sell the commodity, whereas it is now a monopoly in the hands of a few.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WARNER. I will not ask for a division. I see they do not want to reduce the revenue.

Mr. MACDONALD. Not in that way.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 28. That section 3361 of the Revised States, and all laws and parts of laws which impose restrictions upon the sale of leaf-tobacco be, and are hereby, repealed.

Mr. BOWDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Samuel Weller, of facetious memory, tells us of a young woman who, having mastered the alphabet, complained that she had done so much to gain so little. I commend her conclusion to the consideration of our friends on the other side of the Chamber in respect to the pending bill, for aside from the emphatic disapproval which a Republican Senate will give, I indulge the confident expectation that the people will so emphasize this disapproval at the polls next November that even our Democratic friends, with all their temerity, will hesitate to take another first step toward the breaking down of American industries, the degradation of labor, and in my belief the unwonted entrance of the wedge of free trade with the British sledge-hammer behind it.

I can not permit this debate to close, Mr. Chairman, without putting myself on record as entirely opposed to the theory and doctrines of the pending measure. While it contains the clause abolishing the tax upon manufactured tobacco, which I favor, still there is scarcely a great interest in my State, and I may say in our whole country, that it does not affect and cripple, and I await an indorsement which I believe I shall receive at the hands of my people, when I cast my vote against it as a whole, preferring to lose the little good to be obtained by it to gaining the greater evil which its passage would entail.

But I hear my friends on the other side cry, the surplus! the surplus! and I reply, that if instead of placing the surplus already accumulated and now deposited in favored banks of the country without interest, this and future accumulations were applied to the payment of the honest debts of the Government, such, for instance, as the payment of claims of laborers under the eight-hour law, the refunding of the direct taxes, the payment of the thousands of honest claimants, who for years past have been knocking at the doors of Congress, provide proper coast defenses to protect our defenseless coasts from any third-rate power which may see fit to come down upon us, to build up a Navy to comport with the dignity of our nation, to provide for a liberal system of internal improvements, the passage of that most meritorious measure, the Blair educational bill. I say, these things done the cry of surplus, set up for partisan purposes, would disappear, and while the passage of this latter measure would doubtless considerably reduce in the future Democratic majorites, yet the country could stand it, and I do not know if after awhile those benighted regions, where the bull-dozer and ballot-box stuffer most do flourish, would not awake to the beauties of "a free ballot and a fair count."

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the formal amendment will be considered as withdrawn.

Mr. YOST. I move the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Section 28, in line 3, after the word "leaf," add the words "and manufactured;" so it will read:

"All laws and parts of laws which impose restrictions upon the sale of leaf and manufactured tobacco be, and are hereby, repealed."

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I reserve the point of order upon that amendment. Substantially, the same amendment has been offered and voted down in connection with section 25.

Mr. YOST. Then I will offer it as a formal amendment. I want to give you some good Democratic doctrine from the State of Virginia as laid down in an editorial from one of the leading Democratic papers, the Lynchburg Virginian. I want you all to know the sentiments of Democrats as well as Republicans in my State. If the majority of this House can afford to retain the duty on wood-screws for the poor prospect of saving Connecticut, I think possibly they may heed a warning voice from Virginia. If the argument of fact has no effect upon them, perhaps the argument of threat may have. I ask the Clerk to read the editorial which I send to the desk.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. The last official information we had as to the opinion of the Democrats of Virginia was the election of General Lee for governor.

Mr. YOST. The confusion is such that I cannot hear the gentleman.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE TOBACCO TAX.

If it is found impracticable to pass the Mills bill, then let the Democrats of the House of Representatives pass a simple resolution repealing the tobacco tax, and the sooner they do it the better. They have the power, and on their heads the blame will rest if the tobacco trade is not relieved of the paralyzing burden that is upon it. It can not be disguised that the people of the tobacco States are getting restive. Petition after petition from planters and manufacturers have gone to Congress for relief. They have seen the business on which they rely for support reduced to a state of prostration, not paying for the actual cost of production and manufacture.

They have seen their toil go unrewarded or pay the scantiest and most meager returns. They have seen this in the face of broken promises until patience is threadbare. There are murmurs loud and deep from the rural districts. There are murmurs loud and deep from the manufactories. Factory hands are without employment and farm hands are without living wages. Hundreds of thousands of people are more or less dependent on tobacco, either in the field or in the factory, for their living. They see this depression and they attribute it to the tax. They know that the needs of the Government do not require that tax. They know that a huge surplus is piled up in the Treasury, thus crippling trade and commerce. Yet this blighting tobacco tax—a war tax—remains twenty-odd years after the war.

Is it strange that there is widespread discontent, and will it be strange if Democrats who have never wavered before remain from the polls when the election comes which is to decide the fate of parties in November? Sick and sore, weary and worn—smarting under disappointments, straitened and cramped in their pecuniary conditions, will it be strange if party fealty fails and falters? The last feather may seem light, but it is that which breaks the camel's back.

It is simply an outrage that this tax is kept on a great but languishing industry. It is simply preposterous, because it is not needed. It is simply cruel, because it wrings from the sweat and toil of honest labor all the profit there is in it. It is simply stupid and silly, because it is alienating friends. If the Democratic party can afford to do without Virginia and North Carolina in the coming election, then let the tax remain. For we tell the representatives of the party at Washington that there is grave danger that these States may slip their moorings and glide into the Republican port if affairs remain as they are now. We know whereof we speak. We know the deep discontent that is abroad; and we call on the Democrats in Congress to remove the cause of it, or they may be responsible for defeat. Both wings of the party are pledged to repeal, and yet repeal does not come. What are pledges worth that bear no fruit?

Then what to do is simple and plain. Let the House pass the tobacco-tax repeal; let it go into the Senate, and if that body refuses to concur in the bill then the responsibility will be shifted from the Democratic to the Republican shoulders, and the dangers in our path will be removed. We hope these words may not be without effect where they will do the most good. Else when it is too late there may be unavailing repinings and reproaches.

During the reading of the foregoing article the following took place:

Mr. MACDONALD. I ask that the further reading be dispensed with. Every member has received one of those articles. It is a chestnut.

The CHAIRMAN. The communication is being read in the time of the gentleman from Virginia.

The amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. YOST] was rejected.

Mr. COWLES. I offer the amendment I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. I wish to inquire of the gentleman whether his amendment has been submitted to the caucus? If it has not, it will be a waste of time here to vote upon it. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. That is not a parliamentary inquiry. The Clerk will read the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the tax on distilled spirits shall be 50 cents on every proof gallon thereof, and all laws and clauses of laws fixing a greater tax on distilled spirits than 50 cents per gallon are hereby repealed: Provided, That all persons, manufacturers, rectifiers, and dealers who may have on hand at the period when this act shall go into effect packages of distilled spirits upon which the tax has been paid shall be entitled to a rebate of said tax so paid in excess of the amount of 50 cents per gallon.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 29. That whenever in any statute denouncing any violation of the internal-revenue laws, as a felony, crime, or misdemeanor, there is prescribed in such statute a minimum punishment, less than which minimum no fine, penalty, imprisonment, or punishment is authorized to be imposed, every such minimum punishment is hereby abolished; and the court or judge in every such case shall have discretion to impose any fine, penalty, imprisonment, or punishment not exceeding the limit authorized by such statute, whether such fine, penalty, imprisonment, or punishment be less or greater than the said minimum so prescribed.

Mr. ADAMS. I move to strike out that section.

Mr. Chairman, it will be observed that section 29, with several following sections of the bill, represent, in all probability, the Democratic idea. They will not repeal the law abolishing or reducing the tax on whisky, but they will reduce the penalties imposed by existing law for the violation of that law. I for one am not now in favor of abolishing the internal-revenue law; but I do trust that when the Republican party for any reason shall see fit to do so, it will do it directly; that it will not do it by indirection; that will not let loose upon the country a flood of whisky which is not only free, but illegal and fraudulently free; free by the evasion of the law. The penalties imposed by existing statutes are necessary for the enforcement of the law. They will not apply to tobacco. We propose to abolish largely the internal-revenue laws relating to tobacco. They will relate solely to the violators of the law in regard to the manufacture and sale of whisky; and the people who are mainly interested in this part of the bill are the "moonshiners" of the United States.

What I say of this section will apply to almost every section from this point to the end of the bill. If you see fit to reduce the tax on whisky, do so directly.

But it is the evidence of almost every man familiar with the subject, that these laws, odious and inconvenient as they are, are essential incidents of the system, and you ought not to repeal the minimum penalty until you are prepared to change the law.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I want to make a plain, unvarnished statement of fact for the purpose of stirring up the pure mind of my friend from Illinois [Mr. ADAMS] by way of remembrance. That gentleman happens to be a member of the Judiciary Committee. I will change my phraseology. I will not say he happens to be a member of the Judiciary Committee, but that he is a member of the Judiciary Committee. The Judiciary Committee reported a bill containing this very clause.

I am informed that the gentleman was present when it was acted upon by the committee. A unanimous report was made to this House in favor of its passage. No man heard the gentleman open his mouth in opposition to that part of the bill; no man heard him open his mouth in opposition to it when it passed this House unanimously; and yet to-day, for the purpose—I will not say for what purpose, but we may presume for the purpose of trying to weaken this bill—he rises here and makes a speech more vehement than judicious or candid against this provision of the pending bill. Why did he not proclaim against this provision when his committee reported it? Why did he not proclaim against it when the House passed it? Why did he not then say that it was wrong, if it was wrong? No, sir; it was right then—the gentleman must have known it was right—and it is right to-day. Does this turn whisky loose? Does this prevent the imposition of the penalties heretofore imposed by the courts? Not a bit of it. It simply repeals the minimum-punishment part of the penal statute and leaves it in the discretion of the court to fix a less penalty if in the opinion of the court that ought to be done. Now, I want to have read here, in order that it may go into the RECORD, the section of the bill to which I have referred, which was reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, of which the gentleman from Illinois is a member, and was supported by him in committee and in this House.

Mr. ADAMS. I believe the gentleman is mistaken in his statement of fact.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I will stand by the RECORD. I ask the Clerk to read the first section of that bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill to amend the internal-revenue laws, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That whenever in any statute denouncing any violation of the internal-revenue laws as a felony, crime, or misdemeanor, there is prescribed in such statute a minimum punishment, less than which minimum no fine, penalty, imprisonment, or punishment is authorized to be imposed, every such minimum punishment is hereby abolished; and the court or judge in every such case shall have discretion to impose any fine, penalty, imprisonment, or punishment not exceeding the limit authorized by such statute, whether such fine, penalty, imprisonment, or punishment be less or greater than the said minimum so prescribed.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Now, Mr. Chairman, there is not one word in the section of the pending bill reported by the Committee on Ways and Means that is not in the section just read by the Clerk from the bill reported by the Judiciary Committee, of which the gentleman from Illinois is a member.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. Was there a yea-and-nay vote in the House on the passage of the bill from which that extract has just been read?

Mr. MCMILLIN. There was no yea-and-nay vote, and, so far as I know, there was not a single vote against the bill. I do not know whether the gentleman [Mr. ADAMS] was here or not, but if this was the outrageous proposition which he now claims it to be, it was his duty, a duty which he could not avoid without dereliction, to have raised his voice here against it. What shall we think of statesmanship which rises no higher than measures which, if it were parliamentary, I would say were simply demagogical in their nature?

Mr. ADAMS. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the pending amendment.

Mr. ADAMS. I moved before to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair misunderstood the gentleman.

Mr. ADAMS. It will be observed, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] confines himself to the question of my supposed inconsistency in criticising a series of sections in the pending bill, some of which are identical with bills reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, of which I have the honor to be a member. He does not venture to meet the statement which I have made that all this part of the bill from this point on is calculated to make it easier to violate the internal-revenue laws.

So far as the particular section now under consideration is concerned I am aware that it came from the Committee on the Judiciary. I make no answer to the charge of inconsistency. As to what took place in the committee I will not say ay nor no.

Further, I will freely admit that sometimes I sit silent here when the House takes action which I do not altogether approve. Is there no other gentleman on this floor who is ready to make the same confession?

Besides, the committee will remember that when I spoke awhile ago I did not speak of this section alone. I spoke of it in connection with the following sections of the bill. I will say further that when my attention was first drawn to this part of the bill it was mainly directed to the section which occurs later on in the bill, which relieves small grain distilleries from the supervision of storekeepers and gaugers. That is the worst section in this part of the bill in my judgment.

It was my intention to speak only when we had arrived at that section. But when I looked back from that section to the others and found five or six sections of the bill apparently hanging together and forming a system by themselves with one object in view, I resolved to call the attention of the committee to the apparent character and purpose of these sections as soon as we reached the first one, which is the section under consideration. I did this having the impression that the substance of this section had come from the Judiciary Committee and that I had always been doubtful of the propriety of reducing the minimum penalties of the internal-revenue law.

Now, suppose I was wrong in that impression. Suppose that at the time this bill was reported from the Judiciary Committee I was strongly in favor of it. Does that prevent me from criticising it now when I find it in connection with other sections, one of which was exceedingly objectionable and dangerous, and all of them taken together seeming to conduce to fraudulent evasions of the internal-revenue laws relating to whisky? Does it prevent me from pointing out that all of these sections, and particularly that relating to small grain distilleries, seem to form part of the Democratic programme, by which gentlemen on the other side can make it easier for the people of the country, or of some parts of the country, to get free whisky, without taking upon themselves the responsibility of repealing or reducing the tax on whisky? I think not. At all events, I hope the gentleman will at some time, now or hereafter, speak to the other sections of the bill to which I have called his attention.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, yielding to the gentleman's invitation to speak at some time, I speak now when the "spirit moves me" upon the clauses which have so aroused the fears of the gentleman from Illinois. Upon examination of the bill which his committee reported to this House without complaint, and which he saw passed here without murmur, I find that section 29, which has just been read, section 30, which is next to be road, section 31, section 32, and section 33 all met with the gentleman's approval, or at least with his silent acquiescence. Every one of them was reported from his committee favorably, passed this House, and is now in the Senate for its action.

Now, it will not do for the gentleman to say that he was not here, because it appears upon an examination of the RECORD of February 8—the proceedings of February 7, when this bill was passed—that Mr. ADAMS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back adversely the bill to amend an act entitled "An act to restrict the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims." So he was here.

It never occurred to him that the country was going to ruin, that "free whisky" was going to flow all over the land in consequence of this legislation, until we got into the consideration and discussion of a tariff bill which he opposed on other grounds. The bill was debated; opportunity was given to the gentleman to speak upon it; it was a measure, as I have stated, from his committee, and if there was an obligation resting upon him to enlighten the House at all, that obligation applied to a measure about which he had peculiar knowledge from the fact that it came from his committee. Yet the gentleman never opened his mouth. None of this fear overtook him, none of this calamity threatened him, until the tariff bill happened to embody this as a part of the provisions proper to be made in changing the internal-revenue law.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as I stated, this proposition simply leaves with the courts a discretionary power; and it will be remembered that nine-tenths of our present Federal judges are members of the Republican party. They will have the discretion to fix a lower penalty than that now prescribed, but they will not be prevented from going to the full limit of the existing law.

Mr. ADAMS. I move to strike out the last two words, for the purpose simply of calling attention to the fact that the gentleman from Tennessee, notwithstanding my invitation and his apparent acceptance of that invitation, has not seen fit, as he said he would, to discuss the other sections of the bill to which I have referred. I simply ask him to do so hereafter when we shall come to them.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. ADAMS to strike out the paragraph, it was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 30. That no warrant, in any case under the internal-revenue laws, shall be issued upon an affidavit making charges upon information and belief, unless such affidavit is made by a collector or deputy collector of internal revenue or by a revenue agent; and, with the exception aforesaid, no warrant shall be issued except upon a sworn complaint, setting forth the facts constituting the offense and alleging them to be within the personal knowledge of the affiant. And the United States shall not be liable to pay any fees to marshals, clerks, commissioners, or other officers for any warrant issued or arrest made in prosecutions under the internal-revenue laws, unless there be a conviction or the prosecution has been approved, either before or after such arrest, by the attorney of the United States for the district where the offense is alleged to have been committed, or unless the prosecution was commenced by information or indictment.

SEC. 31. That whenever a warrant shall be issued by a commissioner or other judicial officer having jurisdiction for the arrest of any person charged with a criminal offense, such warrant, accompanied by the affidavit on which the same was issued, shall be returnable before some judicial officer named in section 1014 of the Revised Statutes residing in the county of arrest, or, if there be no such judicial officer in that county, before some such judicial officer residing in another county nearest to the place of arrest. And the judicial officer, before whom the warrant is made returnable as herein provided, shall have exclusive authority to make the preliminary examination of every person arrested as aforesaid, and to discharge him, admit him to bail, or commit him to prison, as the case may require: Provided, That this section shall not apply to the Indian Territory.

SEC. 32. That the circuit courts of the United States, and the district courts or judges thereof exercising circuit-court powers, and the district courts of the Territories, are authorized to appoint, in different parts of the several districts in which said courts are held, as many discreet persons to be commissioners of the circuit courts as may be deemed necessary. And said courts, or the judges thereof, shall have authority to remove at pleasure any commissioners heretofore or hereafter appointed in said districts.

SEC. 33. That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may compromise any civil or criminal case, and may reduce or remit any fine, penalty, forfeiture, or assessment, under the internal-revenue laws.

SEC. 34. That section 3176 of the Revised Statutes be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 3176. The collector or any deputy collector in any district shall enter into and upon the premises, if it be necessary, of any person therein who has taxable property and who refuses or neglects to render any return or list required, or who renders a false or fraudulent return or list, and make, according to the best information which he can obtain, including that derived from the evidence elicited by the examination of the collector, and on his own view and information, such list or return, according to the form prescribed, of the objects liable to tax owned or possessed or under the care or management of such person, and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall assess the tax thereon, including the amount, if any, due for special tax, and a penalty of 25 per cent., and he may add to such tax interest at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum thereon from and after the date when such tax became due and payable. The interest so added to the tax shall be collected at the same time and in the same manner as the tax. And the list or return so made and subscribed by such collector or deputy collector shall be deemed good and sufficient for all legal purposes."

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I make a pro forma amendment for the purpose simply of correcting some matters, not with the object of prolonging this debate. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KERR] a moment ago said that I favored the repeal of the internal-revenue system, or that I had referred approvingly to certain efforts made in that direction. Now, I wish my friend from Iowa had not taken from its context what I said in that regard.

I have always favored, as the first proposition in all these economic debates of late years, the prevention and then the reduction of a surplus. I began with that, and I pursue that in this bill as the capital idea. I would reduce the surplus, if not in one way, then in another. I would reduce it, if I can do so, by reducing the tariff.

I would reduce it by reducing internal-revenue taxation. In this bill we have somewhat of both. In it both methods of reduction are presented; but if there were no joining them, or no alternative, I would reduce the internal revenue to be rid of the perilous and corrupting surplus.

Is there any inconsistency in attempting to reduce the surplus either by repealing in part one system or the other or both? The objective point is the surplus. My remarks fully quoted explain the position so that it can not be misunderstood. Thus I relieve the gentleman from any possibility of misrepresentation hereafter. I know he did not intend to misrepresent me on this occasion. Here is the statement from my speech of May 17, 1888:

INTERNAL REVENUE.

In remarking upon the tariff in 1882 I was very frank to contend that I would forego the opposition which I made to the resolution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] for the abolishment of the excise system. I was willing then to forego that opposition on the basis of a resolution which I offered in the House, and which is there quoted. But I desired to abolish the internal-revenue system only as a system or mode of collection, not as to the taxation of certain articles. I was willing to see the tax collected by the States. I think now, as I said then, that it would have worked like a charm. The protectionists were not, however, in favor of reducing taxation in the tariff, but they were in favor of a hasty riddance of the whole internal-revenue system and its Federal mode of collection. I regarded the tariff which we sought to revise as a monument of war necessity and of subsequent treachery. It was promised that it would be reformed after the war when the internal taxes were reduced on home manufactures.

I then inveighed against the Federal administration of the internal-revenue law and favored its abolition because of its cumbrous, corrupt, and spying system. Its officers were then in the habit of pursuing the offender into cigar and tobacco shops, and into stills, breweries, and factories, with threats and promises, in order to influence the voter in favor of the administration. Thanks to Democratic economy, that army of five thousand has since been many times decimated. Worse than the janizary or the mamaluke, it undertook by its occult machinery to intimidate and defraud, and I was willing to do away with it in the Federal system, as every speck of it on our body-politic was then a cancer.

There has been no time since the discussion of the tariff of 1864 when economic measures were before Congress that I have not protested against their excesses, and given the reason, which has been verified; and that is that the excesses would engender a surplus, which was corrupting to legislation and administration. At all times I have been willing to cut down the taxation to avoid this peril. I was willing to welcome relief from this surplus. And since we could not tear away the octopus which was preying upon the people in the indirect form of taxation, I was even willing to take the direct form and thrust it one side; and the more so because it was in the hands of the Republican party, which was using its emissaries and officers for espionage not only in New York City, but elsewhere, for sustaining their corrupt practices and perpetuating their supremacy.

But, sir, this bill is before us. It concerns more a surplus than it does a tariff reform. The surplus is now the principal object with me; the tax but the incident. If I can not apply the reduction at one point, I will hereafter to another. But for the present I believe that the committee that reports this bill, considering all the varied industries of this country, have done the best that was perhaps possible with a view to a successful accomplishment of the great object—the reduction of taxation—so as to avert future accumulations and avoid the paralysis of business.

My friend from Ohio [Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR] prints in the RECORD

this morning a little extract from this same speech. It is also torn from its context. It reads as if I were committed, and the members on this side were committed, to the Cobden-Club system of British free trade. Every one here must know the associate sentences where the remark occurs. The sentence was copied by the gentleman from my remarks made in a playful, ironical way after quoting some Cobden free-trade British poetry, inadvertently used by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS]. I propose in this instance also to restore the context so as to show that in that passage I contended that in proposing by the pending bill to reduce the tariff only 7 per cent. we were not moving on to anything like free trade or any free trade at all, whether Cobden or British or otherwise. The gentleman from Michigan would have been in the attitude of proposing free trade had he known where the poem came from; and what was its meaning and inspiration. His quotation was an invocation to absolute free trade according to the British method and was unwittingly adopted and cheered by the Republican gentlemen.

This is the context and the paragraph quoted:

Was this invocation to free trade limited to my distinguished friend from Michigan? By no means. Other gentlemen, hearing him, arose. They also cried out to aid the dawn!—the same old dawn! But we gentlemen on this side of the House are content simply with a reform which relieves us of 7 per cent. out of the 47 burden, and for purposes of business to prevent the accumulations in the Treasury of the moneys of the people. This reform is hardly a twilight, much less a dawn.

Now, I propose, Mr. Chairman, to signalize this conversion of my friend from Michigan and his brethren who have echoed this song of the dawn of British free trade. I do not propose to be harsh toward them. I would like to see my friend not only assist but assisted in clearing out the way. He will have his troubles by the way. The dawn may be clouded and the paper and type too heavily laden with tax to be useful in a clearing.

It would be a glorious consummation of this debate could we only have gentlemen on the other side join in this invocation to paper and type and to the hearts of honest men to clear the way for British-Cobden free trade.

It was this last paragraph that the gentleman from Ohio, usually so just and fair in debate, so ruthlessly lacerated and dislocated.

Gentlemen should not wrest from their context any remarks on such a controverted issue so as to distort their meaning. When they do they give them a meaning not intended. Is this fair debate?

I know gentlemen on the other side of the House are under some sort of stress to act extraordinarily. I would not judge them harshly. Since their platform was made they have been in desperate straits. Democrats know a little what that means, for at times we, too, have been in the same condition. In making platforms each party juggles more or less; but there never was such a "paltering in a double sense" as in the Chicago platform on the spirit question. I commiserate the gentlemen on the other side. [Great laughter and applause.]

We all know what the Republican platform means. Their platform is in favor of the repeal of the tobacco tax altogether; but it goes further.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Do you know what your platform means? If you do, it is the first time.

Mr. COX. You said awhile ago that you defended Mr. Blaine.

Mr. MILLIKEN. He does not need any.

Mr. COX. You have defended him on account of what he said in his Paris letter against free whisky.

Mr. MILLIKEN. He defended himself.

Mr. COX. You know that letter is not in harmony with the Republican platform adopted at Chicago. Are you not fighting your own party? May God help you in that fight! [Great laughter and applause.]

Mr. Chairman, this is not a question of morality. It is not a question of prohibition. It is not a question of sex. It is not a question of religion. One party or class of men may be more virtuous, politic, sober, and gentle than another. That does not affect this question. This a question of economy, of reducing surplus by the best mode.

We propose one mode, your platform another. Mr. Blaine is not on the platform of Chicago. That allows no disturbance of protective duties, but calls rather for repeal of internal taxes. That includes whisky——

Mr. MILLIKEN rose.

Mr. COX. You are not treating me politely. I will try to make some remarks to show you wherein your platform does not favor the Blaine idea, for he does not propose to put whisky on the free-list.

Mr. MILLIKEN. He is a good Republican always.

Mr. COX. The gentleman is on the other side. Neither is he on the Republican platform.

Gentlemen, the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] called up the women here in defense of the platform for untaxed whisky. He did it to show that they were contending against us who desire to keep up the whisky tax. Again I say it is not a matter of morality, or State police, or prohibition. It is not a matter of religion for Christian women to dabble in. It is a matter of "revenue only"—that, and nothing else. Is it not enough for us old Democrats to fight free whisky without fighting the women at the same time? [Laughter.] The gentleman from Maine [Mr. MILLIKEN], and the gentleman on the other side [Mr. KELLEY], and others, are all tangled up, like their platform. It is as if they had taken some tanglefoot. [Laughter.] But I suppose they took it believing it to be in conformity with their platform. [Laughter.]

How can you go out and answer the questions, pertinent to this campaign, without entangling alliances and confused ideas?

Some tax-payer, tired of your protective exactions, asks:

"Why should only 2,738,895 people, the pets of protection, be favored at the expense of over 70 per cent. of their 60,000,000 fellow-citizens?"

What for? The voice from the still—warm with the tears of widows and orphans—huskily answers, "For free whisky!"

"Why should we not cheapen clothes, blankets, and carpets by admitting wool free, since the woolen mills have a capacity for 600,000,000 pounds, and only 240,000,000 pounds are raised at home?"

The answer comes like the bleat of a thousand flocks, "Before clothes or blankets or carpets, take free whisky!"

But, says an honorable recusant Republican from Minnesota:

Worthier, better, and juster it seems to my mind would it be to give our people, the toiling masses, cheaper food, cheaper fuel, cheaper clothing, and cheaper shelter, cheaper because released from the heavy and unnecessary burden of high-tariff taxes.

"Pshaw!" says the hide-bound protectionist, "these articles must remain taxed to vindicate the American system." That system has as its genius, free whisky.

A tax-payer inquires of you:

"Have not the American people paid in sixty years over $20,000,000,000 in the hope of getting goods cheaper by and by, after the infants have attained their maturity? What, my Republican brother, will you now do?"

The brother answers, "Free whisky!"

"Has invention done nothing for us?" asks the impoverished mechanic. "What do you show us as the result of our American genius for a century in mechanics?"

The answer comes: "We tender you the worm in the still, the finest invention of the devil. It may take away your brains and impoverish your families; but protection must stand! We offer you, untaxed, cheap, free whisky."

Another inquirer asks, "Why do you not take the tax off of my coat of 'reversible nap?' "

The answer comes: "Protection first, but always free whisky."

An old lady of West Virginia asks with anxiety, "Why must I pay 60 cents in addition to every dollar for the crockery from which I drink my sassafras tea?"

"Ah!" says the protectionist, "is not whisky better than tea?"

A series of questions and answers might be fired off in the following order:

"Are you going to allow that reduction proposed by the Mills bill from 47 per cent. duty to 40 on carpets?"

"No, but we will repeal the tax on cigarettes for your young boys, and add free whisky."

"Won't you support that reduction of 10 per cent. on cotton goods?"

"No, but I would love to lower the whisky tax."

"Won't you reduce the tax on castor-oil below 194 per cent.—its present rate."

"No, I won't condescend to help anybody but those who want the cost of whisky reduced."

"Please help us reduce the tax on cheap woolen cloth from 89 per cent. to 40 per cent. as Mills proposes—will you not?"

"No; I do not want to engage in anything else till I have taken the tax of 90 cents a gallon from whisky."

"We are making a last effort to reduce the duty on wool hats from 54 per cent. Cheap hats. Won't you help us?"

"No, sir; the Republican platform don't say anything about cheap hats. It does advocate taking tax from whisky, and I stand by the platform."

"The worsted goods for my family is taxed 68 per cent. Help me pull that down to 40 per cent., will you not?"

"No, sir; let your worsted goods go to grass! Whisky is more than a dollar a gallon. I want to take the ninety-cent gallon tax off of it."

"Now, my friend, the Mills bill proposes to take eleven and one-half millions tax off of sugar; won't you help us pass it?"

"No, for it don't propose to cheapen whisky one cent."

"It makes salt free. Won't you favor that?"

"Is salt whisky? Salt ain't in our platform."

"It makes the tin, of which our tin stove-vessels, and cans, and roofs are made, free; won't you give us that?"

"Tin is not in the platform; whisky is."

"It makes lumber for our homes to keep us warm free. Won't you favor that?"

"No. I want to legislate to warm the inner man, not the outer man. Give us free whisky."

When these questions are answered let me read as a summing up to the gentleman what was said by an old farmer friend of mine in Iowa. He had evidently been perusing Sydney Smith on taxation:

I never wore any clothes that were not increased in price by this policy of making an almshouse of every possible factory. I used to rise on Sunday morning from my humble cot in a log farm-house, throwing off the bed-clothes taxed 40 to 100 per cent., and donning my clothing taxed 35 to 100 per cent., eat my taxed breakfast from dishes taxed 45 per cent. on a table-cloth taxed 40 per cent., and when the Sabbath bell taxed 35 per cent. sounded its inviting notes

I took my Bible taxed 25 per cent. and went to the church built of lumber taxed 20 per cent. and there in a Sunday-school song-book taxed 25 per cent. (and all these taxes paid to the objects of my charity, not to the Government) I read:

"Far out upon the prairie
How many children dwell
Who never read the Bible
Nor hear the Sabbath bell!"

[Great laughter and applause.]

What is the relief my old farmer friend receives from you and your platform?

"Free whisky."

Does this give comfort to his family, his purse, or his soul?

Now, you gentlemen want to go among the men, women, and children of this country and say:

"We will not take the tax off of cheap clothing, cheap lumber, cheap food, but we will take the tax off of whisky, to make it cheap and common and more hurtful to soul and body."

Is not that an inspiring issue for a party of moral elevation?

Oh, gentlemen, it is the old, old story. You gentlemen must often have heard it sung—

Oh, what a tangled web we weave
When first we practice to deceive!

[Laughter and applause, and cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. MILLIKEN. I desire to ask my friend from New York [Mr. COX] why he failed to read all there was in the schedule of the old farmer? Why did he omit in reading that schedule the tax of 100 per cent. on rice and 82 per cent. on sugar? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. COX rose.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I will allow the gentleman, although he would not allow me.

Mr. COX. How could I read in five minutes the tax on four thousand articles? [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. MILLIKEN. My friend has tried to read in five minutes the taxes on particular articles he desires to quote, but he omits to read those like the tax on rice of 100 per cent. and the tax on sugar of 82 per cent.

My friend acknowledges himself he is willing to reduce the internal revenue if by that means he is going to reduce the surplus, but can not do it otherwise. All that the Republican party says upon that subject is that it would rather reduce taxation on sugar than to destroy the industries of this country.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. That is what it says.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Now, gentlemen on the other side, including my friend from New York, are trying to draw parallels between free whisky and free wool, free whisky and free blankets, free whisky and free shoes; but from the first man to the last who has spoken on that side of the House I never heard one draw a parallel between free whisky and free sugar. You do not hear them drawing any parallel between free whisky and free rice. Why, gentlemen, do not some of you stand up here and tell the truth about that question?—that notwithstanding the fact the duties upon articles produced in the North must not bear taxation, and you have a list of fifty-three of them which you put on the free-list in this bill, remember less than 27 per cent. of the duty is paid by them, while of those that are peculiar to the South you get 75 per cent. duty; and yet you talk about free whisky or something else that pays 10, or 15, or 20 per cent., and you are not at the same time willing to reduce two of the great Southern products down to the average rate on products of 41 per cent.

And when my colleague the other day introduced an amendment to that effect every man upon the other side who is so entirely anxious to reduce taxation that he cries over the poor fellow that pays taxes upon his Bible—well, I do not know if my Democratic friends would pay very many taxes on Bibles anyhow—but who cries when a man pays taxes on his shoes, or on his lumber, or on his coat, does not seem to sympathize with him very materially when his sugar is put into his tea which comes in free, and in his coffee which comes in free, on which sugar he has to pay 82 per cent. tax, and if he had rice for breakfast, 118 per cent. on that, and you propose to leave it at 100 per cent.

Why do you not come out squarely and fairly about this matter? Why are you not willing to equalize the duties when you contend that that is your object, and when you know that our people are paying a duty of 47 per cent., and you propose to reduce them 7 per cent. and leave 75 per cent. and over on Southern products?

Mr. COX. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman, the nervous anxiety on the part of gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber, and particularly that exhibited by the gentleman from New York who has just taken his seat, the night-mare that frightens his Democratic soul for fear the country may have free whisky, is something very amazing to people who understand the history and habits of Democrats. [Laughter and jeers on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MCCLAMMY. Bah! [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. MASON. Keep right on my friend, you will get there. [Laughter and applause.]

I know that in some States—and I advise the gentleman as a matter of kindness, if he does not want to lose the solid support he has had heretofore, not to try to make the people believe he is in favor of free whisky.

Mr. COX. My constituents drink beer. How much was drunk at Chicago?

Mr. MASON. There was a great deal drunk at Chicago, but more after the convention at St. Louis adjourned than ever before. They stopped on their way up. [Laughter.]

The truth of the matter is, we are getting very weary about hearing this talk of free whisky. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Thank you gentlemen; that is the first time you ever did me the honor to applaud. I thank you.

Why, gentlemen, if you believed we were in favor of free whisky, every man on that side would move his seat over here, and you know it. You would be all glad of the chance to walk up the aisle and "smell the breath." [Laughter.]

You advertise to the people of this country that you are in favor of taxing whisky, when in this very bill you open the door to every species of fraud and collusion between the men who make the whisky, or have it made for their benefit; and then you gentlemen say the Republican party is in favor of free whisky. Put it in the platform if you will, and I tell you that the party that puts it directly in its platform will carry every Democratic State in this Union [laughter], and the first of all the gentlemen who would move his seat to this side of the House is the eloquent gentleman from New York [Mr. COX], and we will most cheerfully welcome him when he comes over.

Mr. COX. Oh, I have been here too long now to change. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will regard the pro forma amendment as withdrawn.

Mr. MASON. I withdraw it.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I renew it for the purpose of asking the committee whether they have knowledge of any treaties or treaty with any country which would be affected by this provision? I think, but I am not sure, that this is new legislation and I would like to have information, if they have it, as to what countries have treaties which would be affected by it.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I repeat the question. I would ask the committee in charge of this bill, if they have that information, as to what countries we have treaties with, which treaties would be affected by the bill if section 35 were in it?

[After a pause.] I asked for the information because I do not possess it. As I receive no answer, I suppose the committee have no information to give; and therefore I move to strike out the section.

The amendment was rejected.

The committee rose informally.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed the bill (S. 2395) authorizing the President to appoint and retire John C. Frémont as a major-general in the United States Army; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

The message further announced that the Senate recedes from its amendment numbered 7 to the bill (H. R. 9345) making appropriations for the expenditures of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889.

The message further announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 869) for the relief of the sufferers by the wreck of the United States steamer Tallapoosa, asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. CAMERON, Mr. CHANDLER, and Mr. BLACKBURN.

THE TARIFF.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

The Clerk read section 361.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out that section. If I am correctly informed the new part of this section is, first, the insertion of the words "or other fruits" in the first part of it——

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. What line?

Mr. ADAMS. Line 8, "Apples, peaches, or other fruits."

I may be wrong, but my understanding is that those words "or other fruits" are not part of the existing law. The second and most important provision is the section in regard to exempting the small distilleries from supervision by storekeepers and gaugers. I am sincerely desirous of hastening a vote on this bill. I simply want to point out what I consider an objection in the pending bill. In the absence of explanation it seems to me it is a change in the wrong direction. I have no doubt the gentleman from Tennessee or some other member of the committee will explain the reason for making that change in the existing law. I shall be glad to have some gentleman show what is the necessity for the remainder of these two sections. As I understand the law—I may be misinformed—the distiller does not pay the salary of the storekeeper.

A small distiller wanting to run his distillery without the supervision of the storekeeper, if he desires the passage of this law, desires it from some other motive than to save the expense.

Let me say one thing more and then I will sit down. It is a matter of serious doubt whether a provision like this will reduce the surplus revenue. It may multiply the small distilleries. The amount of revenue derived from those distilleries when estimated by their capacity may bring more money into the Treasury than now comes by a tax upon the output; and yet if this change in the law does open the door to fraud, and I am sure it will, more whisky will be put upon the country in proportion to the tax paid than is produced under the existing law.

Mr. MCMILLIN. In response to the first inquiry made by the gentleman from Illinois, I will say that the paragraph simply gives the Government authority to license the still for distilling other fruits than apples, peaches, and grapes now provided for and for the collection of the tax thereon. For instance, it provides for the distillation of blackberries, cherries, persimmons, or other fruit. There is no law, as I understand, now authorizing the licensing of the distilleries and the collection of the tax thereon.

Mr. ADAMS. There was formerly a law.

Mr. MCMILLIN. None that I remember of now. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that this phraseology was submitted to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and approved by him.

Mr. ADAMS. Will the gentleman state what other fruits can be used besides those he has mentioned?

Mr. MCMILLIN. I have mentioned blackberries, persimmons, and cherries; and I might add plums and fruits of that kind.

In the second place, Mr. Chairman, as to that portion of the section beginning with line 11, and ending with line 33, I will state the simple object is to save expense in the administration of this law. The Secretary of the Treasury is given discretion to tax the capacity of the small distilleries, in place of causing them the expense of keeping a storekeeper or gauger at the distillery to watch over them.

It is not compulsory on the Treasury Department. It is not compulsory, even if he adopts this plan for other distilleries, that he shall do it for the small distilleries. The expense to a small distillery making no more than 15, 20, or 25 gallons of spirits per day is very great in proportion to the product, and it was thought by the committee that inasmuch as each bushel of grain yields about an equal amount of spirits, grain differing in that respect from fruit, it would be safe and wise to place in the discretion of the Treasury Department the power to permit the running of these distilleries without the presence of Government officers, thus saving the expense and fixing the tax by the capacity of the distilleries. It would be simply a matter of discretion with the Secretary.

Mr. ADAMS. Is it asked for by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue?

Mr. MCMILLIN. It was submitted to the Commissioner.

Mr. ADAMS. But it was not suggested by him.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I do not remember that it was asked for in his report.

Mr. ADAMS. Is it a fact that the distiller pays the storekeeper?

Mr. MCMILLIN. The distiller does not pay the storekeeper. The storekeeper is paid by the Government, and it was to get rid of these unnecessary officers and to save their salaries that this provision was inserted.

Mr. ADAMS. Did it occur to the gentleman to extend that provision to the large distilleries? There would be a larger saving.

Mr. MCMILLIN. There would not be a larger saving, because it costs not $2 a day more to place a guard at a distillery making ten, twenty, or thirty thousand gallons of spirits daily than to place a guard at one making only 20 gallons a day.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. If there be no objection, the pro forma amendment will be regarded as withdrawn.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of my friend who is in charge of this bill to the fact that the provisions amending the internal-revenue law can not be in the interest of the general public. The people are not clamorous; indeed, nobody is demanding that all distilleries mashing 25 bushels of grain or less per day shall be released from the supervision of the officers of the law, namely, storekeepers and gaugers, whose duty it is to prevent fraud, in order that the Government may save the salaries of those officers. If the gentleman has had experience in the matter of prosecuting offenders against the internal-revenue laws, or in defending them, he must have learned that the real and only reliable safeguard against fraud is to be found in the fact that the storekeeper is constantly in charge of the distillery, and that the gauger is at hand to see that the law is enforced. Now, this provision authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury, through the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, to leave the distillers who mash not over 25 bushels of grain daily, which would be equivalent to not less than 4 gallons per bushel, to run their distilleries free from any supervision whatever by the officers of the law. And all this where there is greatest temptation to commit fraud, and where, as the record discloses, frauds are most frequently committed. It is no answer to say these distilleries will be taxed according to their capacity. That is already the law.

Every distillery is surveyed and its capacity determined, and the owner is required to pay a tax on at least 80 per cent. of the capacity of the still, no matter whether he returns a less quantity or not, and he is required to pay on the whole amount produced, whatever it is; but as stated, in no event less than 80 per cent. of the registered capacity of the still. But it is obvious that before the whole quantity produced can be taxed that quantity must be ascertained, and the amendments to the law, embodied in this bill, practically render the ascertainment of the quantity of spirits produced by certain stills, over thirteen hundred in number, impossible. And I say this for the reason that to enforce the law it has been found by years of experience to be not only indispensable to keep a storekeeper and gauger in charge of the distillery, but that the storekeeper be kept there on watch day and night. They are not permitted to sleep while on watch or to be away from the distillery while on duty, and that because it is so easy to divert the spirits from the cistern or from the conduit-pipe between the still and the cistern.

Hence it is found necessary to have not only an accurate survey of every distillery, but also to keep those officers in charge and to have them inspect daily everything pertaining to the distillery. I do not hesitate to say that every lawyer who has been employed to prosecute or defend in cases involving frauds against the internal-revenue law knows that experience has demonstrated that no officers are employed and no duty is exacted of them which is not indispensable to the prevention of fraud. And the only demand I have ever heard since I have been a member of this body for doing away with storekeepers at distilleries comes from districts where frauds are common, and where, of all places, storekeepers are most needed.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Is it not a fact that the Government now adopts this plan in reference to distilleries making spirits from apples and other fruits?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. So far as that is concerned, it is a sufficient answer to say that one of the main sources of fraud now in the distillation of spirits is in the very industry he mentions.

Mr. MCMILLIN. But is it not a fact that the Government now adopts this plan in reference to those distilleries?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. It may be so.

Mr. MCMILLIN. It is so. Now, it is much more practicable to apply this plan to small grain distilleries than to apply it to fruit distilleries, because fruit in some years will make a great deal more brandy than it will in other years, so that so accurate an average product can not be established for fruit as for grain.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. O, yes, there can. Grain yields all the way from 2½ gallons to 4½ gallons per bushel—it depends a good deal upon the ability and experience of the distiller, and, so far as the actual product is concerned, the law provides that the distiller shall pay a tax upon every gallon produced, if it can be ascertained how much that is, and in any event he must pay a tax upon 80 per cent. of the capacity of the still. Eighty per cent. of the capacity is as high as it has been deemed just to fix the assessment arbitrarily. Now, this provision is not in the interest of good law or good morals.

So far as I can gather from expressions on the other side of the House, this industry is one which ought not to find special favor or to be encouraged. Gentlemen on the Democratic side have shown signs of distress at the bare thought of free whisky. Whether they are disturbed or not may be determined by their effort in this clause of the pending bill to do two things. One to enable the distillers to defraud the Government of the tax due on distilled spirits and at the same time provide a bountiful supply of free, that is to say untaxed, whisky; and this they do by removing the main if not the only safeguards against the manufacture and sale of "crooked whisky." The gentlemen on the other side have declared that the moral sentiment of the country is against the producer of whisky, and hence they say whisky must be taxed; and while saying this they provide by law for the encouragement of illicit distillation, and do it in the name of the people, affecting to reduce the burdens of taxation. It amounts to this, that while pretending to save from three to four dollars in the wages of a storekeeper they make it easy for the distiller to defraud the Government out of fifteen or twenty dollars. That is economy with a vengeance.

And, Mr. Chairman, I can not see how it is demanded. It opens the door to fraud and will make the blackmailing of distillers a fine art, and soon whisky-rings will abound in the land. So utterly defenseless is this provision that I do not hesitate to say that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue did not recommend such a measure; and if he did, and I feel assured that he did not—but if he did recommend it and I was President of the United States I would demand his resignation immediately and unconditionally.

I can not see why it is demanded. Since the distiller does not pay the salary of the storekeeper, what has he to find fault about? Who is asking the discharge of storekeepers, and the freedom of distilleries from supervision in order to save the salaries of those officers, whose duties mainly, and in fact solely, relate to the prevention of frauds? Since his property is safer when a storekeeper is employed, as that officer looks after the premises night and day and does not cost the distiller a cent, why should he grumble, unless he wants to violate the law and finds the officer in the way?

Mr. McMILLIN. We propose to do this to save the Government expense.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. To save the Government expense indeed? But if the Government loses ten in order to save three or four dollars it will not prove a profitable investment. The object assigned is to save the cost of a storekeeper, but the storekeeper's presence is essential to the collection of the tax due the Government. And to save three dollars in salary and lose from ten to twenty-five dollars in taxes is not very wise legislation, and does not smack of economy. Who asks for this? Who has petitioned for it? You say the petitions come from the mountains. That is true, and strangely or naturally enough they come from the quarter where frauds are so common as to suggest the necessity of doubling the force rather than removing it altogether.

Manifestly, the distillers, if they are honest, would prefer to have storekeepers, since they are a safeguard and cost them nothing. And if it is in aid of fraud they are to be discontinued this House will not, or rather let me say ought not, sanction any legislation that tends in that direction.

Mr. Chairman, the honest distiller does not demand this; the taxpayers do not demand it. Then who does? This is a bid in what direction and for what purpose? It can serve no proper purpose to the honest men engaged in distilling. They have in no wise petitioned for it. Who upon this floor will deny that the power here conferred to levy taxes or remit them at pleasure is a dangerous power to be conferred upon any officer of this Government? I propose to inquire into the scope of this authority, and see where it would be exercised, if at all, and whether the history of the districts in the matter of observing the law has been such as to suggest that there is wisdom in the measure under consideration.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] one question: At whose instance is this proposition presented?

Mr. McMILLIN. The committee have submitted it in the belief that it would save the Government a large expense by doing away with a large number of officers with whom the Government can dispense.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. That is not my question. At whose instance is the proposition made?

Mr. McMILLIN. If there has been any request for this measure from any distiller I do not know of the fact.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. That is an answer. But, I will say, Mr. Chairman, I am afraid this measure is likely to encourage illicit distillation——

Mr. McMILLIN. Not at all.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. I know that members of the Committee on Ways and Means would not favor it, if they anticipated such a result.

Mr. McMILLIN. Of course not. And the Secretary of the Treasury will have power to discontinue this method of proceeding at any time, and return to the old system if he desires to do so.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry in order to ascertain precisely what is pending. I understand there is a motion pending to strike from this paragraph the provision authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury or the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to enforce the law or not as he pleases.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair may be in error, but he understood the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADAMS] to move simply a pro forma amendment.

Mr. ADAMS. I moved to strike out the whole paragraph. Afterward, when debate was exhausted, I moved a pro forma amendment. My substantial motion is to strike out section 36.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I wish to learn from my friend from Illinois the precise effect of his motion. As I understand, it leaves the law as it is to day?

Mr. ADAMS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I move to amend the gentleman's amendment so as to strike out that portion of the paragraph beginning with the word "the," in line 11, down to and including the word "gaugers," in line 19. I favor striking out the whole clause, but want a division so as to render the provision as little harmful as possible. If we can not strike it all out possibly we can a part.

If in order, I desire to call attention to the effect of my amendment to the amendment. The amendment I offer seeks to strike out the following words:

> The Secretary of the Treasury may exempt all distilleries which mash less than 25 bushels of grain per day from the operations of the provisions of this bill relating to the manufacture of distilled spirits, except as the payment of the tax, which said tax shall be levied and collected on the capacity of said distilleries; and said distilleries may, at the discretion of the said Secretary, then be run and operated without storekeepers, or storekeepers and gaugers.

The committee seem by this remarkable provision, judged in the light of experience, to be in favor of the law, but are against its enforcement.

They say he shall pay the tax, but in the same law provide for dodging payment without danger.

One clause in the section provides for exempting from tax all spirits produced from any kind of fruit. The present law applies only to apples, peaches, and grapes. The words "other fruits" are added.

Now, without stopping at this moment to discuss the effect of adding the words "or other fruit," or whether it is wisely proposed or not, the other clause, and which as a separate proposition I move to strike out, relates to this clothing the Secretary with discretionary power to rigidly enforce the law as against one class of distilleries and leave the others to be in large measure a law unto themselves. It provides that one class shall be so hedged about by the officers of the law as to be compelled to pay their taxes and others shall not. It provides that a certain class of distillers shall pay what might be termed a capacity tax and be exempt from all surveilance, so they may run double time or extra quantity, and in fact do largely as they please; while all other distillers shall have in their establishments the sworn officers of the law who shall supervise the running of their distilleries twenty-four hours a day and render fraud absolutely impossible. This law, or proposed law, opens up the fountains of apple-jack, apple-brandy, and all other kinds of spirits distilled from fruit, and makes it free, all supplemented by opportunity to add crooked whisky to the supply, always provided it is the product of a distillery mashing less than 25 bushels of grain per day.

The history of the administration of the internal-revenue law in the United States has satisfied every one here who is familiar with that history that there is no business in which there is such strong temptation to commit fraud as that of distilling, and it is because there is a clean profit of from 90 cents to $1 a gallon on every gallon produced which evades the payment of tax. While it ostensibly saves at the spigot, it loses at the bung-hole. In other words, you save three or four dollars a day for storekeeper, while you lose in the matter of tax on what is produced by these distilleries from $5 to $25 and upwards.

Mr. McCULLOGH. If the small distiller is permitted by the Secretary of the Treasury to run without a storekeeper, and nobody but a collector of customs or a deputy collector could make information against him, how could the internal-revenue tax be collected, and how could frauds be detected?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. It is a grant of absolution to the small distillers who violate the law, and that is all there is of it. It is to place them above and beyond the reach of the law. They can not even be arrested, except on the oath of a man who had personal knowledge of the offense. The result is, taking the several clauses inserted here as amendments to the internal-revenue law, that it makes fraud on the revenue easy, and arrest and conviction of the person committing the fraud impossible. The small distiller is invited to commit the fraud by having the opportunity provided, and he is encouraged to commit it by the provision of the law (a part of the same act) which renders his arrest and conviction next to impossible.

To show that I am not overzealous in my opposition to the amendment to the internal-revenue law reported in this bill, I wish to call attention to a few facts of controlling importance in determining whether these amendments proposed by the committee are wisely ordered.

I have already called attention to the fact that in the light of experience there is no trace of economy in relieving these distillers from the surveillance of Government officials, but that the result would be that in saving one dollar we would lose four or five, which can hardly be regarded as economical.

What I desire to call especial attention to, however, is the fact that this effort in behalf of the distillers mashing less than 25 bushels of grain per day, comes from a quarter where violation of the internal-revenue law seems to be the rule, and not the exception. North Carolina seems to be for it. North Carolina has over 700 stills that would be released from governmental supervision now provided by law. Georgia is for it. She has 113 stills that would be relieved from that supervision. Kentucky seems delighted with the arrangement. She has 268 stills that would be released from all the restraint which the presence of a storekeeper suggests. Tennessee has 102 stills that are anxious to be freed from supervision. Virginia, 55; Arkansas, 39.

And while this is true of those States, it is equally true that in the same localities violations of the internal-revenue law, accompanied by acts of violence, are of frequent occurrence.

Now, if we turn for a moment to the States that yield the larger revenue on distilled spirits we will find that Illinois has not a single still that will not remain subject to supervision by Government officials, and very properly so. Whether she will have when this bounty on fraud goes into operation remains to be seen.

Indiana has but 5; Massachusetts has none; Missouri has less than 30; New York has none; Ohio has less than a dozen; Pennsylvania has about 64. So that it occurs that the great spirit-producing States of Illinois, Missouri, Pennsylvania, Ohio, and New York have, all told, but about 100 of these distilleries. The sections where frauds are committed constantly, notwithstanding this surveillance which this bill would remove, have over 1,300.

So far as revenue is concerned this business is thoroughly self-sustaining. It more than pays its own way. In fact it leaves a balance in the Treasury, after paying all the expenses of enforcing the law and collecting the revenue, of over $50,000,000. And in this connection it is well to call attention to the fact that during the last fiscal year, in the territory especially interested in the passage of this bill as presented to the House relieving the distillers of that section from the supervision necessary to prevent fraud, there were 299 stills seized and destroyed and 157 removed, all for violating the internal-revenue law. Gentlemen may judge from this whether or not supervision in that section is necessary, and whether removing it is the highway to a successful administration of the law and the collection of the revenue. And further to show the influence of that supervision I cite the record, which shows that the number of stills seized grows constantly less. In 1880 there were nearly a thousand stills seized; in 1881, 756; in 1882, 397; in 1884, 377; in 1885, 245; but for some reason, possibly an anticipation of this relief, in 1886 the number ran up to 564, and in 1887 to 456.

Unless the purpose is to undo what has been accomplished in the last twenty years in the direction of perfecting the internal-revenue law and stopping its enforcement, certain paragraphs amending the internal-revenue law should be stricken from this bill.

I desire in conclusion to say that if the statement of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] is correct, and it certainly is, to the effect that if you take 2 gallons of pure whisky and add to it 1 gallon of apple brandy, there is no expert in the world that could tell that the resulting 3 gallons was not pure apple brandy, you can realize how apple brandy will abound in the neighborhood of these small distilleries when they are realeased from surveillance by Government officers as is proposed in this bill. The result will be that every gallon of apple brandy will be multiplied by three, and since the extension by this bill of the free-list to spirits manufactured not only from apples, peaches, and grapes, but from fruits of any and every kind, the range of fraud will be limitless.

In fact, if I was called upon to devise a law the direct tendency of which was to enable fraud to be committed profitably and with safety, and which would enable the officers of the law to form combines with certain distillers, I do not think it would be necessary to change a syllable in the measure reported by the majority of the Ways and Means Committee.

The result of the legislation proposed in the bill as presented must be that small distilleries will be established all through the country with convenient proximity to stills established for making apple brandy, peach brandy, etc., and compounding liquors and compounding fraud will become common as in the palmiest days of the whisky ring. And these gentlemen who affect to be disturbed because they have found in the Republican platform a statement which suggests that if it was necessary to protect and shield American industries they would strike down the internal-revenue system have in the very bill which they have reported, and which seeks to strike down a hundred industries—leading industries in the United States—opened the flood-gates to turn loose a swelling tide of free whisky and at the same time offer a premium on frauds upon the revenue. And this is done, too, in the presence of the fact shown by the record, that, with all the vigilance of the Government officials, nearly 25 per cent. of all the distilleries to be affected by this provision have been guilty of committing fraud during the last eighteen months.

A malicious person might imagine that this was a way to raise a campaign fund. Of course it is not, but as it has no useful mission on earth, and as it is not demanded by any persons who are engaged in legitimate and honest distilling, or who desire to conduct their business honestly, some other explanation should be offered for the remarkable measure beyond the matter of saving the salary of storekeepers.

It may be remarked with regard to that specious plea that the Democratic party is not likely to be swift in mustering its own appointees out of the service on the eve of a Presidential election. I had much rather believe (and the conditions under which this measure is proposed force that conviction upon me) that they will not be mustered out, but will be afforded opportunities for thrift which will only be limited by their consciences.

To say that the Secretary of the Treasury need not do this unless he thinks it will be in the interest of the Government is not an argument that rises to sufficient dignity to demand reply or consideration. It is equivalent to saying to the Secretary: In our judgment you should authorize sweeping opportunities provided for herein, but if you find the experiment unsatisfactory from any point of view, after the special advantage which may result during the next few months from this raid against the law and upon the Federal Treasury, and has been enjoyed by those who are specially interested in those violations, you may put a stop to it.

Of all the propositions submitted to this House with reference to the internal-revenue law, this is the least defensible and has the strongest flavor of a deliberate purpose to encourage those who are known to be habitual violators of law. And beyond that, it is another instance of lifting the burdens from an industry (if it may be called an industry) south of the Ohio and the Potomac and pack-saddling the same industry north of those rivers.

It possesses so little intrinsic merit that it is difficult to have patience while considering the proposition. If my language appears somewhat earnest, I appeal to the facts and the experience in regard to the administration of the law—internal-revenue law—in extenuation or defense of that earnestness, if such an extenuation or defense were needed.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. The present system of internal revenue is based on the hypothesis that the persons engaged in business within the scope of that system are men desiring to cheat the Government. I think that is a mistaken basis upon which to build a system of business or taxation. I think it is unwise, and all laws passed since the introduction of the internal-revenue system have been based on the conception that they are for the purpose of preventing fraud.

It has grown to be an extensive system, consisting to-day of a very large army of office-holders. It is a system which depends largely on the fidelity of those officers, who are paid comparatively small salaries, who are brought into immediate, direct personal contract with the persons whom they are to watch and whose operations are very large.

Now, this is an experiment offered to the Government, not mandatory, not directory, but purely discretionary, that with the smaller distilleries the Secretary of the Treasury and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall have the privilege of devising and putting into operation a system, if one can be devised, which will not need the gauger and the storekeeper, and to see if the tax can not be collected by some less expensive, less arbitrary system, with less espionage and possible oppression. Whether it can be done or not I am not prepared to say. Whether the Secretary or the Commissioner of Internal Revenue will think it wise to use this discretionary power of course I can not foretell. It does not abolish the offices of gauger and storekeeper.

It will be remembered that at these small distilleries the "gauger and storekeeper" is a single officer, and it is this officer that is meant in this bill, and not those officers who are "gaugers" or those who are "storekeepers," which officers are for the larger distilleries. But as to those distilleries which mash less than 25 bushels per day the Secretary of the Treasury is given power to make such regulations and adopt such system as in his judgment——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I hope the gentleman will have additional time.

Mr. ADAMS. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Kentucky be permitted to conclude his remarks.

There was no objection.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. It provides that the Secretary of the Treasury and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, as to these distilleries which mash 25 bushels and less, may see if a system can be devised to secure to the Government all the tax to which it is entitled, and yet relieve the Government from the expense and the distillers from the supervision of the storekeepers, and adopt the experiment to see whether the entire system of internal revenue may not be made less arbitrary, less oppressive, and less exacting.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Certainly.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Is it not true and has not experience shown it to be the fact that the frauds which permeate this business from one end of the country to the other have shocked the moral sense of the country, and experience has proven that nothing but just such vigilance as we have will prevent such frauds?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I entirely disagree with the gentleman. The fraud was originally because of the enormous temptation that a tax of $2 a gallon furnished to fraud and to illicit distilling, and the mode in which the frauds were frequently committed was in the purchase and corruption of the supervising "vigilant" officer. The mode by which the Government was cheated was through the connivance of persons connected with the Government as officers or agents acting in their official capacities; but since the tax was put at 90 cents a gallon the frauds have largely decreased, and when the tax can be reduced, as indubitably it ought to be some day, say to 40 or 50 cents a gallon, which would be 200 per cent. upon the value of the article, the frauds would be almost unknown in connection with the business, especially if the indefinite extension of the bonded period was given, which is the true policy and ought to be done.

Our view of one method of modifying the present system so as to furnish less excuse for fraud and a less expensive system is embodied in the bill, and this paragraph is merely the substance of the bill reported to the Forty-ninth Congress and of the bill passed by the Forty-seventh Congress.

It was our hope that a system might be devised by which by the survey of the still and by the inspection of the books of the distiller the Government might know the amount of the material purchased and of the product, and thus collect the entire tax due to the Government with much less expense and without offensive espionage.

The large distillers, the distillers who produce thousands of gallons a day, and therefore do it at an expense running from 13½ to 17½ cents on the gallon, of course had the interest to freeze out the smaller distillers, who made a somewhat different article, but at a very much larger cost. I take it for granted that the average cost to the smaller brandy distiller is not less than from 32 to 45 cents a gallon, and to the smaller and less well-constructed distillers where whisky is made the cost is from 35 to 40 cents a gallon. It is the interest of the larger distillers to burden with as many restrictions in the way of exactions and supervision as possible their smaller competitors.

Mr. ADAMS. Let me ask the gentleman how it can be an exaction when it is only the presence of an officer of the Government?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. But the gentleman will see that it is not merely that. It is that in part; but the section goes much further. It exempts these distillers from the operation of the provisions of this title relating to the manufacture of spirits, except as to the payment of the tax, which shall be levied and collected upon the capacity of the distilleries. So that it does not merely relate to the presence of the "gauger and storekeeper;" but it provides that the Secretary of the Treasury shall have power under it to devise a system not now in vogue.

I do not know that this change is a matter of real importance, but one of the reasons why I advocated this provision in the Forty-ninth Congress, and why I advocate it to-day in the Fiftieth Congress, I am frank to say, is a different reason from that which has been mostly given in its behalf. I believe that the payment of so much of the expenditures of the Government as can be fairly, and without too much burden, raised from spirits, ought to be thus raised. I believe the best way to accomplish that is to remove the unnecessary burdens and oppressions which the present system lays upon the persons who distill, and the persons who are involved in difficulties under this law. I have, since I have been in Congress, attempted to remove these annoyances so far as possible in every way so that the system might be a system free from the constant irritations which accompany its execution, and that it might produce larger revenue with a reduction of the rate of the tax; that is, the lower rate of the tax might be followed by an increase in production of the article.

Therefore, as this furnished a possibility (I do not know that it can be more than that) for the adoption of a system, or experimental trial of a system, which might be free from the irritations which mark the execution of the present law, I thought it worth while to give that power to the executive branch of the Government, whether to a Democratic administration or to a Republican administration was a matter that did not enter into my view; but that the executive department should be given the power to see whether a system might not be adopted which would give better results in the collection of the taxes and in the removal of exactions than the one we now have.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Will not my friend agree that the better legislation would be to have the Secretary recommend the system to the House and let it be embodied in the form of law.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. The objection to that was twofold. It did exactly what the present system does. It made us enact with inflexible legislative statute whatever we chose to put into it. It gave, therefore, none of that flexibility of detail which this discretionary power gives. In the second place, it threw upon the Secretary of the Treasury the burden of recommendation of changes that he might not be willing to make. My experience has been, in my short public service, that when a system is once established every officer who undertakes to execute it wants it let alone. He understands its operation. He knows what the law means as it is. He views with alarm any change and is opposed to it. It seemed to me all we could do was to say to the Secretary of the Treasury and to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, "Here is the problem, take it and see if it can be solved, and if it can not be solved nobody is hurt." The system is not changed. If it can be done it is to be tried in a comparatively narrow arena with small distilleries. It can not do much harm. If it fails to work the Secretary has the power to set it aside.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. CHAIRMAN. Debate on the amendment is exhausted.

Mr. KELLEY. I move to amend the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. No further amendments are in order.

Mr. KELLEY. Then I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. KELLEY. About as long as my friend from Kentucky had; a generous five minutes, or until I get to the rounding off of the closing period, as he did.

There was no objection.

Mr. KELLEY. I desire to say, Mr. Chairman, that sections 29, 30, 31, and possibly 32, struck me when introduced in the Committee on Ways and Means as a well-devised system of provisions for relieving moonshiners from responsibility, and as I have read them day by day and heard them discussed to-day I have been confirmed in that opinion.

Section 29 provides, as an opening to the system, that whenever in any statute denouncing any violation of the internal-revenue laws as a felony, crime, or misdemeanor there is prescribed in such statute a minimum punishment, less than which minimum no fine, penalty, imprisonment, or punishment is authorized to be imposed, every such minimum punishment is hereby abolished; and the court or judge in every such case shall have discretion to impose any fine, penalty, imprisonment, or punishment not exceeding the limit authorized by such statute, whether such fine, penalty, imprisonment, or punishment be less or greater than the said minimum so prescribed.

That is to say, that however guilty the moonshiner may be found the judge may relieve him by imposing the enormous penalty of 1 cent as a fine. I think we had better retain a well-defined system of punishments for offenses against the internal-revenue laws.

Section 30 provides that no warrant in any case under the internal-revenue laws shall be issued upon an affidavit making charges upon information and belief. Oh, no. We are to remove storekeepers, gaugers, and others who now watch the distilleries, and then we are to prohibit the issue of a warrant unless the party comes up with such personal information as a storekeeper might bring and swears "upon my actual knowledge crime has been committed." In all other matters information and belief will suffice. But under this proposed system of licensing illegal distilling information and belief will not do; and affidavit of positive knowledge must be made by one who can not once in a thousand times possibly have the certainty of knowledge; and unless such affidavit is made by a collector or deputy collector of internal revenue or by a revenue agent it will not answer. First, we remove those who might obtain the knowledge and then refuse to arrest the guilty moonshiner unless the positive oath be made.

Let us look a little further. The section provides as follows:

And the United States shall not be liable to pay any fees to marshals, clerks, commissioners, or other officers for any warrant issued or arrest made in prosecutions under the internal-revenue laws, unless there be a conviction or the prosecution has been approved, either before or after such arrest, by the attorney of the United States for the district where the offense is alleged to have been committed, or unless the prosecution was commenced by information or indictment.

It is a beautiful system, a well-devised and closely compacted system for giving moonshiners absolute immunity from internal taxes. So tender of the rights of those people are the framers of these provisions that they will not permit the present law requiring the destruction of illicit stills to be carried into effect, and they require the judges of county courts to watch over the health of the unfortunates who shall have been sent to prison for moonshining before these statutes for their relief go into effect. This is not exaggeration, though it sounds extremely like it.

Mr. McCULLOGH. And the Secretary of the Treasury takes it altogether out of the collector's hands. He dismisses the collector and gives free fruit brandy.

Mr. KELLEY. Section 38 proposes to amend section 332 of the Revised Statutes so as to provide that—

When a judgment of forfeiture, in any case of seizure, is recovered against any distillery used or fit for use in the production of distilled spirits, because no bond has been given, or against any distillery used or fit for use in the production of spirits, having a registered producing capacity of less than 150 gallons a day, every still, doubler, worm, worm-tub, mash-tub, and fermenting-tub therein shall be sold, as in case of other forfeited property, without being mutilated or destroyed.

The present law requires that they shall be not only mutilated, but destroyed. Now, sir, when these doublers, worms, worm-tubs, mash-tubs and fermenting-tubs shall be offered for sale under these provisions I should like to see the man who would dare to bid upon them at the mouth of their owner's rifle. The fellow from whose still-house they are taken will doubtless attend such sale and stand there with his rifle or shot-gun. The sale will take place, and he or his son Johnny will bid one dime, or a nickle, and, as nobody will at the risk of his life compete, the goods will be knocked down to Johnny and put back in the illicit still-house.

This section goes on to further provide, as follows:

And in case of seizure of a still, doubler, worm, worm-tub, fermenting-tub, mash-tub, or other distilling apparatus of any kind whatsoever, for any offense involving forfeiture of the same, it shall be the duty of the seizing officer to remove the same from the place where seized to a place of safe storage.

It will not do, if any part is made of iron, to put them in a damp or exposed building lest the iron should rust or corrode. This section requires them to be put in a place of safe storage.

And then comes the provision that said property so seized shall be sold as provided by law, but without being mutilated or destroyed.

Again, the fellow may curse the hard fortune which requires him to move them back to his distillery, but he need not add more than a dime to the expense of removal, because there will be no danger of competition. And then if, in spite of this liberal provision, a fellow should happen to be sent to jail for anything, section 39 provides:

That whenever it shall be made to appear to the United States court or judge having jurisdiction that the health or life of any person imprisoned for any offense, in a county jail or elsewhere, is endangered by close confinement, the said court or judge is hereby authorized to make such order and provision for the comfort and well-being of the person so imprisoned as shall be deemed reasonable and proper.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. Does that mean that he shall be lodged in the best hotel and fed on the best fare? [Laughter.]

Mr. KELLEY. That would be within the spirit of the act, but it is not so expressly provided. If one of the judges whose jurisdiction embraces Rowan County, Kentucky, or any county throughout the mountain region of the South, should hear that Johnny's father is likely to suffer in his health, and should refuse to make the order for his removal to more comfortable and salubrious quarters, the shot-gun might come into use upon the judge himself. At any rate, Mr. Chairman, I think it would be wise either to strike out these provisions or else to guard the rights of the Government and of the honest distiller a little more securely than they will be guarded by the provisions of this bill. To enact them into law would be to throw away twenty-five years of experience.

Mr. McMILLIN. Let us have a vote now.

Mr. BAYNE. I want to make a few brief observations.

Mr. McMILLIN. Well, let it be understood that debate shall close in ten minutes from this time, five minutes on each side.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. BOWDEN. I wish to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. This request will not interfere with the offering of an amendment.

There was no objection to the request of Mr. McMILLIN, and it was so ordered.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, there is a great deal in the observations just submitted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] that I do not care to respond to at all. The Federal judiciary are pretty much all members of the Republican party. It is my pleasure to bear testimony, as to some of them at least, that they are men of high character, and earnest, faithful, and honorable in the administration of the law. It is right that I should say that I have no personal or representative interest of a local nature in these provisions of this bill, because very little of the business to which they relate, either licit or illicit, is carried on in the State where I reside. There is, however, a question involved in the remarks submitted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania in which I have a profound interest. That is, the preservation of those great cardinal principles which guaranty and protect the rights of the individual citizen which are found embodied in the Constitution which we have inherited from our fathers.

Article IV of the Constitution provides that—

The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

And the great curse of this internal-revenue system, or rather the administrative features of it, has grown out of the abuse of this provision of the Constitution. I hold that every citizen of this country, whether under this or any other law, is entitled by the provision of the Constitution which I have cited to be secure from any arrest that is not based upon oath or affirmation, and that not resting upon "information or belief;" and if there is a statute to be found on the books this day which authorizes issuance of a warrant upon information or belief it ought to be repealed, as hostile to the personal liberty of the citizen, whether it relates to the internal-revenue laws or not. I speak, of course, of the criminal law of the land.

And so the Judiciary Committee, composed of such members from both sides of the House as the Speaker thought were worthy of a place upon it, united in the opinion that this provision of the law which the gentleman from Pennsylvania assailed was in accord with the constitutional theory of our Government and ought to be incorporated into public law.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Does not the gentleman know that this very statute to which objection is made here requires more than oath on information or belief?

Mr. ROGERS. I do not think so.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. It clearly does.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, the main object for which I rose I have stated——

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. I will call the attention of the gentleman to this language in section 30 of the bill:

No warrant, in any case under the internal-revenue laws, shall be issued upon an affidavit making charges upon information and belief, unless such affidavit is made by a collector or deputy collector of internal revenue or by a revenue agent; and, with the exception aforesaid, no warrant shall be issued except upon a sworn complaint, setting forth the facts constituting the offense and alleging them to be within the personal knowledge of the affiant.

Mr. ROGERS. As I now recollect, there is a provision in section 30 permitting the law to stand with relation to internal-revenue officers just as it now does, but making exception as to all other parties.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. But suppose the officer of the law does not see the offense committed, as usually happens, why should not the arrest be made upon information or belief?

Mr. ROGERS. If I had my way no arrest of a citizen should be made except upon the oath or affirmation of a person having knowledge of the facts.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Then this kind of crime would go unwhipped of justice.

Mr. RYAN. Of course it would.

Mr. ROGERS. It is very much easier to make an assertion of what the result will be than it is to prove what I have stated is not the law. The provisions of the Constitution, the supreme law of the land, ought to be observed.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BAYNE. I do not think our friends on the other side, after having incorporated this provision in the present bill, can charge Republicans with being in favor of "free whisky." If this proposition does not mean "free whisky" it is impossible for me to imagine any legislation that would.

A MEMBER. It will only be free in certain localities.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. Free in the South. The distillers in the North will continue under the old law.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] oppose this provision because it favors free whisky?

Mr. BAYNE. I do. I am opposed to free whisky.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina. Then you are against the platform of your party.

Mr. BAYNE. This proposition to exempt from taxation certain brandies made of fruit, and the other proposition to exempt distilleries from supervision by Government officials, simply open the road to free whisky. Under these provisions a large distillery in a Northern city will be compelled to pay the tax, while the multitude of smaller distilleries in the rural sections of the Southern country will be exempt altogether from this taxation.

The gentleman from Kentucky stated that since the tax on whisky had been reduced to 90 cents a gallon frauds were not frequent, and therefore the necessity for supervision is not so pressing now as it was when the tax was $2 a gallon. The gentleman can not surely have recurred to the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, or he would not have made that statement. On page 15 of that report the Commissioner of Internal Revenue states that during the fiscal year there were criminal suits commenced to the number of 6,165.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. How many of those were for violations of the law as to special licenses?

Mr. BAYNE. I do not know.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I think the gentleman will find that over 50 per cent. of them are for such violations of law.

Mr. BAYNE. Very well; assuming that to be the fact, then three thousand of these prosecutions have reference to the evasion of the tax in some other way.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Not exclusively in regard to whisky; cigars and beer are included.

Mr. BAYNE. But I imagine if only five hundred suits were brought against illicit distillers in this country during a year it would be a very large number in proportion to the number of persons engaged in this business—a very great percentage.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina. How many of those prosecutions are reported to have gone to final judgment?

Mr. BAYNE. Seven hundred and ninety-nine.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina. Exactly; and the rest were dismissed.

Mr. BAYNE. No, they were not.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina. What became of them?

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. They are probably on the docket for trial.

Mr. BAYNE. No; not even that. There are 799 of these cases where the judgments and costs have been paid, and 2,383 cases prosecuted to judgment where judgment and costs have not been paid.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina. What became of the others?

Mr. BAYNE. Here are 179 that were settled by compromise, and there were 812 that were decided against the United States.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina. Exactly.

Mr. BAYNE. In this great aggregate of cases the United States seem to have lost a very small percentage. Therefore, whether these prosecutions were made upon information or belief, or were the result of Government supervision, it is shown most conclusively to my mind that there is a pressing necessity for maintaining a strict surveillance of the manufacture of liquor. As my friend from Ohio said, it is a gross injustice to the men who pay their taxes and are willing to be supervised that others should be permitted to carry on the business without any such supervision.

I append to my remarks the table to which I have referred.

REPORTS OF DISTRICT ATTORNEYS.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on this paragraph is now closed. The question is first upon the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADAMS]. It will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In section 36 strike out, commencing with line 11 down to and including the word "gaugers" in line 19.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 67, noes 81.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 73, noes 98.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The question recurring on the amendment of Mr. ADAMS, the committee divided; and there were—ayes 48, noes 82.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BOWDEN. I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

Insert after line 33, section 36:

"And provided further, That no tax for deficiency shall be assessed upon any distiller from fruit."

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MCKENNA. I offer an amendment to be known as sections 38, 39, 40, 41, and 42.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 38. There shall be an allowance of drawback of the tax represented by tax-paid stamps, on wine-spirits, the product resulting from the distillation of fermented grape-juice, including the product commonly known as grape-brandy, used in the fortification of sweet wines manufactured for exportation and actually exported. The wine-spirits to be used must be received on the premises of the manufacturer of the wine, in the original distiller's packages to which the tax-paid stamps are affixed. The use of the wine-spirits, the manufacture and exportation of the wine, and the allowance of drawbacks shall be under such regulations, bonds, and bills of lading as the Commissionsr of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall from time to time prescribe. The penal sum of the bonds shall be equal to double the amount of the tax to be secured, and shall be with good and sufficient sureties, to be approved by the collector required by the regulations to take the bond. The sums found to be due under the provisions of this section shall be paid by the warrant of the Secretary of the Treasury on the Treasurer of the United States out of any money arising from internal duties not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That the allowance of drawback shall be computed on the quantity of brandy in taxable proof gallons actually used from each package for the purpose herein authorized. And no claim for such drawback shall be entertained or allowed unless accompanied by such portion of the tax-paid stamp from each such package as shows the serial number thereof, the number of the package from which it was removed, the date of payment of tax, the name of the distiller, and the quantity of brandy contained in the package upon which tax has been paid, such portion of the tax-paid stamp to be removed by the United States gauger who determines the actual contents of the package at the time it is mingled with the wine. And every person who fraudulently claims, or seeks, or obtains an allowance of drawback on wine-spirits, or fraudulently claims any greater allowance or drawback than the tax actually paid thereon, shall forfeit and pay to the Government of the United States triple the amount wrongfully and fraudulently sought to be obtained; and shall be imprisoned not more than ten years; and every person who knowingly aids or abets in the fraudulent collection or fraudulent attempts to collect any drawback upon, or knowingly aids or permits any fraudulent shipment of, any wine-spirits or wine, shall be fined not exceeding $5,000 and imprisoned not more than one year. Every person who intentionally relands within the jurisdiction of the United States any wine which has been shipped for exportation under the provisions of this act, or who receives such relanded wine, and every person who aids and abets in such relanding or receiving of such wine, shall be fined not exceeding $5,000 and imprisonment not more than three years; and all wines so relanded, together with the vessel from which the same were relanded, within the jurisdiction of the United States, and all boats, vehicles, horses, or other animals used in relanding and removing such wines shall be forfeited to the United States.

SEC. 39. That wine-spirits as herein described may be withdrawn from special bonded warehouses at the instance of any person desiring to use the same to fortify any wines, in accordance with commercial demands of foreign markets, when such wines are intended for exportation, without the payment of tax on the amount of wine-spirits used in such fortification, under such regulations, and after making such entries, and executing and filing with the collector of the district from which the removal is to be made such bonds and bills of lading, and giving such other additional security to prevent the use of such wine-spirits free of tax otherwise than in the fortification of wine intended for exportation, and for the due exportation of the wine so fortified, as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury; and all of the provisions of law governing the exportation of distilled spirits free of tax, so far as applicable, shall apply to the withdrawal and use of wine-spirits and the exportation of the same in accordance with this section; and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is authorized, subject to approval by the Secretary of the Treasury, to prescribe that wine-spirits intended for the fortification of wines under this section shall not be introduced into such wines except under the immediate supervision of an officer of internal revenue, who shall make returns describing the kinds and quantities of wine so fortified, and shall affix such stamps and seals to the packages containing such wines as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. Whenever such wine-spirits are withdrawn as provided herein for the fortification of wines intended for exportation by sea, they shall be introduced into such wines only after removal from storage and arrival alongside of the vessel which is to transport the same; and whenever transportation of such wines is to be effected by land-carriage, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe such regulations as to sealing packages and vehicles containing the same, and as to supervision of transportation from the point of departure, which point shall be determined as the place where such wine-spirits may be introduced into such wines, to the point of destination, as may be necessary to insure the due exportation of such fortified wines.

SEC. 40. That all provisions of law relating to the reimportation of any goods of domestic growth or manufacture which were originally liable to an internal-revenue tax shall be, as far as applicable, enforced against any domestic wines sought to be reimported; and duty shall be levied and collected upon the same to the extent of the distilled spirits contained therein which were originally liable to internal-revenue tax; and in case it is impracticable to determine the exact amount of such distilled spirits liable to tax, the rule for levying the duty thereon at the port of entry shall be by considering all the alcohol in such wines, other than sweet wines, in excess of 15 per cent., to be subject to duty at the rate of 90 cents per proof gallon, or at the same rate for each fractional gallon; and all domestic wines containing more than 24 per cent. of alcohol sought to be reimported from foreign countries shall be classed as alcoholic liquors, and taxed at the port of entry at the rate of 90 cents per wine-gallon for each gallon of such liquors, if not exceeding in strength that of proof-spirits, and if exceeding the strength of proof-spirits, then at the rate of 90 cents per proof-gallon: Provided, however, That if any distilled spirits have been added to such wines of domestic growth after they have been exported to foreign ports, or if such wines have been compounded with any foreign wines or other substances not produced from grapes, the rate of duty levied and collected on the same, when reimported, shall be equal to that levied and collected on foreign products of a similar nature.

SEC. 41. That any person using wine-spirits or other spirits which have not been tax-paid, in fortifying wine otherwise than as provided for in this act, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, on conviction thereof, be punished for each offense by a fine of not less than $200 nor more than $2,000, and for every offense other than the first also by imprisonment for not less than thirty days nor more than one year.

SEC. 42. That wine-spirits used in fortifying wines may be recovered from such wine only on the premises of a duly authorized grape-brandy distiller; and for the purpose of such recovery wines so fortified may be received as material on the premises of such a distiller, on a special permit of the collector of internal revenue in whose district the distillery is located; and the distiller will be held to pay the tax on a product from such wines as will include both the alcoholic strength therein produced by the fermentation of the grape-juice and that obtained from the added distilled spirits.

Mr. MCKENNA. This amendment now proposed passed the Senate in the Forty-ninth Congress. It was put on as an amendment upon what is called the "fractional-gallon bill." It came to the House, was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and was reported back to the House favorably with the recommendation that it pass. It has received the support of the Senate, it has received the approval of the Committee on Ways and Means as at present constituted, with the exception of Mr. Morrison. The amendment is a quotation from the conference report, and it will afford, if adopted, the producers of sweet wines of California and of the United States a decided benefit and advantage in foreign markets where their product now must compete with wine that has paid no tax.

The committee is probably aware of the fact that it is necessary in the production of this character of wines to add spirits of some kind in order to prevent their deterioration; in other words, for the fortification of the wine. The producer of the wine must now pay a tax of 90 cents a gallon to the Government. This amendment simply provides that upon the exportation of that wine this tax shall be refunded to him. That is the whole of it. It once passed the Senate, as I stated before, received the approval of the Committee on Ways and Means, and I see no reason why it should not pass the House now and become a part of this bill.

The question was taken, and on a division there were—ayes 57, noes 73.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HITT. I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting as an additional section to section 37:

"That the tax on all distilled spirits hereafter entered for deposit in distillery warehouses shall be due and payable before and at the time the same are withdrawn therefrom and within one year from the date of entry for deposit therein, and warehousing bonds hereafter taken under the provisions of section 3296 of the Revised Statutes of the United States shall be conditioned for the payment of the tax on the spirits as specified in the entry before removal from the distillery warehouse, and within one year from the date of said bonds."

Mr. HITT. That amendment simply provides for restoring the bonded period to its former term of one year, the time which was given to the manufacturers of whisky for many years after the internal-revenue law was originally passed as the period during which they need not pay any tax upon that product. It was found by experience that this period of exemption from taxation was profitable, and a pressure began, which increased from year to year, and from month to month, until in 1878 a new three years' law was passed, which was pressed by some very powerful influences, and urged upon the ground that the whisky interest was distressed by overproduction, an overproduction stimulated by the very fact that it was so profitable. This pressure succeeded in securing an extension of the profitable bonded period to three years.

To protect the Government against the great loss on their part evident upon the face of the proposition, it was coupled with a provision that the distillers should pay 5 per cent. upon the deferred tax; in other words, upon the amount which the Government advanced; but it was not a great while before that provision was swept away. It has long since passed from the statute-books, and no interest whatever is now exacted on the millions upon millions of taxes owing to the Government from the vast volume of whisky resting in bonded warehouses for three years.

A still greater stimulus was given to whisky production in this country by that change of law, and then a new and stronger pressure was brought for a further extension; and all members who served here since the Forty-seventh Congress will remember the urgent and powerful influences brought to bear from time to time to extend the bonded period and give greater and greater advantages to the manufacturers of whisky by extending the period from three years to five years and then to seven years; and I suppose that those most deeply interested are sanguine in the hope that in the end there will be a complete removal of the bar, so that it will remain for an indefinite period exempt from tax in the warehouses or until the manufacturers choose to take it away.

The change of law was at first justified partly on the ground that importers of foreign spirits were allowed to hold it for a time in warehouse; but this great difference exists: the importer who puts foreign liquor in a Government warehouse is compelled to pay 10 per cent. on the tax or duty due and charges. The domestic manufacturer pays no interest. Nor is this exemption analogous to the time allowed for the tax on tobacco or beer, because tobacco and beer can not be improved by being kept like whisky, and therefore there is no profit in holding them. There is no investment by the Government in those for the profit of the manufacturer.

The curious effect of the law, bent about in this way, as the result of ingenuity and experience, so as to enrich whisky-producers by a tax apparently heavy, but with this extraordinary privilege, has produced the strange spectacle in this country to-day of a great interest, a closely organized body of rich men, who are themselves the most strenuous supporters of the law that imposes upon them one of the heaviest taxes known to our system. They do not care for the amount of the tax while they have this great exemption. The peculiarity in the way the tax is imposed and collected gives them an extraordinary privilege and an enormous profit.

That profit, contrived in the law for a business which the moral sentiment of the world condemns, is one that has led many good men to revolt at the whole system of taxing whisky and to ask for the repeal of the whisky tax, though themselves the most earnest temperance men. The gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] has just stated, and stated pointedly, the strong feeling that animates the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and which animates a great many good men and women who undoubtedly represent largely the moral sentiment of the day, in calling for the repeal of the whole law, because their attention has been so intensely directed to its abuses. They see that it has been made an instrument for enormous profits by those who are supposed in theory to be burdened by it, whose business would seem to be discouraged by it——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON. I ask that the time of my colleague be extended.

The CHAIRMAN. For what time?

Mr. CANNON. For five minutes.

Mr. HITT. I will be very brief.

There was no objection.

Mr. HITT. I have said that the law as it stands was profitable to the whisky manufacturer. Let me state briefly in detail how ingeniously the bonded period was contrived to enrich men who make whisky. It costs but 15 cents a gallon to manufacture whisky. A barrel, containing 50 gallons, only costs $7.50 to make it. That is the whole capital that is to be laid out, the whole investment by the citizen engaged in this business. The tax upon it at 90 cents per gallon is $45, and that investment the Government puts up for three years without interest.

There is a loss at the end of three years of about 7 gallons by evaporation on a barrel of whisky, and the tax is deducted for that, and is never paid. That is $6.30. Then on the 43 gallons which are left the tax is $38.70, and the division of profit is about this: The whisky which has aged and mellowed and improved is worth about $1.90 a gallon, I am informed by those conversant with the business, when taken out of bond at the end of three years; that would be $81.70. He sells it for this when he takes it out of bond. Of that the tax would be $38.70, leaving $43 to the owner who has invested only $7.50, and realized as clear profit $35.50 in three years upon the investment of $7.50. Now, right there in the law is the life of the whisky trust. Many gentlemen have called upon us here in speeches appealing to our patriotic indignation at the wrongs of the mass of our people because of the colossal trusts and monopolies that have grown up.

There are oppressive trusts, and some of them have their roots in the law. This is one, and the amendment I offer would break it up. It was shown here in this debate a few days ago that the sugar trust was based upon and intrenched in the cunning provisions of the law, not upon the amount of duty levied, but upon the peculiar arrangement of the schedule of duties on sugars, admitting raw sugars which the trust import at low duties, and charging very high duties on refined sugars which the trust sell, thus excluding all foreign competition. That vicious schedule, so convenient for the sugar trust, is kept in the Mills bill. So it is with the internal-revenue law. It is because of this extraordinary privilege of whisky-makers; it is because of this singular exemption which experience has shown to be so profitable that production is crowded upon the market to such an extent that it has to be held down to-day by the iron hand of a trust; by the authority of a great combine. In many of your Congressional districts gentlemen know there are distillers to-day whose establishments are idle drawing enormous subsidies from the trust although doing nothing; paid for being idle that the whisky market may be absolutely controlled and these millions of profit realized under this most unfair and unjust law.

Such a law as this ought to be amended, and if this sting is taken out of it the vast support it now receives throughout the country from all those who seem to be burdened but are really benefited by it would be taken away. Then the Woman's Christian Temperance Union and the whisky combine would exchange positions. The ladies who labor for temperance and the clergymen who preach the suppression of evil would not call for the repeal of a tax that really burdened and discouraged what they all believe to be an accursed thing. Men would then say to one another, "Do not repeal the law and cheapen whisky, for that is virtually putting the cup to your neighbor's lips." Then the whisky manufacturer, compelled to pay the tax without exemption, would cry out, like all other taxed interests, and we would have no more of the whisky lobby here to press new and endless extensions of the bonded period. I earnestly hope we may adopt this amendment, which all on this side of the House will vote for, and cut down this bonded period of three years during which whisky pays nothing, while the Government, as a sort of trustee, guards it till it enriches the whisky maker.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I think it is proper under all the circumstances to put on record my protest against the doctrine announced by the gentleman from Illinois. The law as it now stands is not a proper law. I frankly admit that and agree with the gentleman, but not for the reason he gives; nor is the remedy in the direction of his amendment.

The present tax on whisky is about 400 per cent. on the best of beverage whisky or brandy, and about 500 per cent. on high wines. The high wines are better as they run from the still than they ever afterwards become. It is to the interest of the distillers to have the tax paid at once.

Therefore, if they could induce the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADAMS] and the House to require the tax to be paid once, they incidentally, by legislative ledgerdemain, destroy their competitors who make beverage whisky.

Mr. REED. High wines are not a beverage.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. As a rule they are not, but to the great injury of life insurance companies they become such.

Now the objection to the present law is that it requires the tax to be paid before the article on which the tax is paid goes into consumption; it requires it to be paid at a fixed time before the article is fit for consumption, and therefore it is rather in the nature of a tax on production than a tax on consumption. The Committee on Ways and Means, however, did not see their way clear to recommend any change in the present law as between the various parties whose interests are different in regard to these matters. There was an interest in favor of the repeal of the extension for three years; there was an interest in favor of an indefinite extension of the bonded period; there was an interest in favor of the reduction of the taxes; there was an interest in favor of making fruit brandies free; there was an interest in favor of making alcohol used in the arts free; and, after going over the whole subject with very great care, the committee thought that all these matters had better be put into a separate bill and stand upon their own individual merits instead of being attached to a bill like this for the reduction of taxation. Therefore, as between these various interests, the committee reported a bill which leaves the law as to those matters as it now is, as it was passed by preceding Congresses after very full debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT].

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 66, noes 86.

Tellers were demanded and ordered.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 60, noes 87.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 38. That section 3332 of the Revised Statutes, and the supplement thereto, shall be amended so that said section shall read as follows:

"When a judgment of forfeiture, in any case of seizure, is recovered against any distillery used or fit for use in the production of distilled spirits, because no bond has been given, or against any distillery used or fit for use in the production of spirits, having a registered producing capacity of less than 150 gallons a day, every still, doubler, worm, worm-tub, mash-tub, and fermenting-tub therein shall be sold, as in case of other forfeited property, without being mutilated or destroyed. And in case of seizure of a still, doubler, worm, worm-tub, fermenting-tub, mash-tub, or other distilling apparatus of any kind whatsoever, for any offense involving forfeiture of the same, it shall be the duty of the seizing officer to remove the same from the place where seized to a place of safe storage; and said property so seized shall be sold as provided by law, but without being mutilated or destroyed."

Mr. BUCHANAN. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 66, lines 10, 11, 12, strike out "sold," in line 10, and all down to and including "or," in line 12; lines 17 and 18, strike out "sold," in line 17, down to and including "or," and insert in lieu thereof the words "after such judgment or forfeiture."

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, under the law as it now stands when an illicit distillery is seized the apparatus is destroyed. This bill provides that it shall not be destroyed even after a judgment of forfeiture, but shall be sold. My amendment provides that it shall be destroyed after such a judgment. It would seem to be perfectly proper that after a judgment of forfeiture had passed the property should be destroyed and not be sold by the Government to be again applied to its unlawful purpose. Preserving it in this way is very much as if a police court should preserve the "jimmy" for the burglar after it had convicted him.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 40. That all clauses of section 3244 of the Revised Statutes, and all laws amendatory thereof, and all other laws which impose any special taxes upon manufacturers of stills, retail dealers in liquors, and retail dealers in malt liquors, are hereby repealed.

Mr. SOWDEN. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Amend section 40 by striking it out and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"Section 3244 of the Revised Statutes and all laws amendatory thereof, and all other laws imposing special taxes upon distillers, brewers, rectifiers, manufacturers of stills, and stills and worms, wholesale liquor-dealers, retail liquor-dealers, dealers in leaf-tobacco, dealers in manufactured tobacco, manufacturers of tobacco, manufacturers of cigars, peddlers of tobacco, wholesale dealers in malt liquors, and retail dealers in malt liquors, are hereby repealed."

Mr. SOWDEN. The committee propose to repeal only the special taxes collected from retail liquor dealers and retail dealers in malt liquors. The amounts of special taxes collected from those two sources during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, were, from retail liquor dealers, $4,587,268.21, and from retail dealers in malt liquors, $177,148.13. The committee have made an unfair distinction in this particular. I should like to know how they can justify their position when they seek to repeal the special internal-revenue taxes only so far as they relate to retail dealers in liquors and malt liquors, leaving the other special taxes undisturbed. Why not repeal all special taxes and remand the imposition of taxes for licenses to the different States under their several police regulations? It seems to me that it is inequitable to insist upon the brewers, the dealers in leaf-tobacco, and the others enumerated in my amendment paying special internal-revenue taxes and at the same time relieve those dealing in liquors and malt liquors from this iniquitous and unnecessary burden.

I agree with the committee in so far as they go, but complain because they did not wipe out all special internal-revenue taxes, which my amendment proposes to do. I do not believe that the Federal Government should collect any special taxes from retail dealers in spirituous or malt liquors or from any other source. These are proper subjects of taxation under the laws of the several States, and their respective Legislatures can safely be trusted with the control and regulation of the same.

During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, a special tax of $176,600.12 was collected from the rectifiers, $416,304.66 from the wholesale liquor-dealers, $860.86 from the manufacturers of stills, $2,860 on stills and worms, $51,891.14 from dealers in leaf-tobacco, $1,245,412.65 from dealers in manufactured tobacco, $5,563.75 from manufacturers of tobacco, $113,340 from manufacturers of cigars, $14,701.94 from peddlers of tobacco, $187,352.24 from the brewers, and $170,275.33 from the wholesale dealers in malt liquors, besides the $4,587,268.21 from the retail liquor-dealers and the $177,148.13 collected from the retail dealers in malt liquors, as already stated.

The total amount of special taxes collected during the period named was $7,149,579.03. The committee propose to relieve two classes of dealers, from whom was collected $4,764,416.34 last year, and leave unrepealed all other species of special internal-revenue taxes, from which was collected $2,385,162.69 during the same period, while my amendment proposes to repeal all these unnecessary taxes.

Why does the committee make the unfair discrimination pointed out? Why not put all these dealers in the same category? Why impose special taxes upon one class of dealers and not upon the others? Why discriminate against the brewers, rectifiers, wholesale liquor-dealers, wholesale dealers in malt liquors, and manufacturers of tobacco, etc.? Why not abolish the entire system of special internal-revenue taxes? I should like to hear some reason for the discrimination which the committee make in its proposition to repeal only a portion of these special taxes. The retention of any of these taxes seem to be unwarranted and inexcusable.

Mr. MCMILLIN. In response to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SOWDEN], I will say that upon those articles on which taxation is imposed a certain supervision is necessary to be retained by the Government. The tax on dealers in leaf-tobacco has been repealed; there is now no such tax. The provision which misled the gentleman from Pennsylvania is retained in the bill in order to enable the Internal-Revenue Department to utilize very costly and valuable dies and other appliances used in the printing of stamps, etc.

So far as concerns wholesale dealers in spirits, the committee thought it proper to continue taxation upon them in order to maintain the supervision of the Government over whisky and prevent evasion of the tax. Provision has been made for the repeal of those special licenses under which most of the indictments and oppressive proceedings of which complaints have been made originated. I think when the gentleman examines the whole bill he will find it provides for the abolition of all taxes that can be abolished consistently with the integrity of the system and the proper collection of the revenue.

Mr. LAWLER. I desire to submit the following resolution adopted by the Cigar-Makers' International Union:

Resolution adopted at the seventeenth session of the Cigar-Makers' International Union of America, held at Binghamton, N. Y., September, 1887.

Whereas an agitation is being vigorously presented to abolish the internal-revenue on cigars and tobacco;

Whereas experience has demonstrated that the agitation even on this subject has had the effect of keeping thousands of workers in our trade out of employment for months at a time;

Whereas the internal-revenue system, so far at least as it applies to the manufacture of cigars, has had the effect of developing it from a mere sporadic calling into a fully-established industry by which nearly 75,000 of our people earn their livelihood; and

Whereas the abolition of the internal-revenue on cigars would not benefit either producer or consumer by reason of its fractional bearing on each cigar; Therefore,

Be it resolved, That we, the representatives of the cigar-makers of the country in convention assembled, protest respectfully, but emphatically, against any interference with the internal-revenue on cigars.

AUG. STRUMEL,
Cigar-Makers' Union, Chicago.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. SOWDEN, it was rejected; there being—ayes 41, noes 75.

Mr. LAWLER. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at the end of section 40 the following:

"And so much of the act of August 2, 1886, which assesses and directs the collection of a tax of 2 cents per pound upon oleomargarine, namely, section 8 of said act, be, and the same is hereby, repealed."

Mr. LAWLER. Mr. Chairman, I have not occupied any time in the consideration of this bill, and I now ask consent to speak upon this amendment for ten or twelve minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. LAWLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment to repeal the per pound tax imposed upon oleomargarine in consonance with the several bills and resolutions previously presented by me looking to this end, which proposed measures, by the rules of the House, should have been referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, but which were nevertheless consigned to the not very tender mercies of the Committee on Agriculture. In the womb of this body they have been allowed to remain since the early days of the present session without delivery and "unhatched."

I maintain that every argument advanced in support of the bill to reduce taxation reported by the Ways and Means Committee is an argument in favor of this proposition to abrogate the pound tax on oleomargarine, and the views of the President as set forth in his message urging reduction of the surplus through lowering of customs dues find pronounced application in the matter of the relievement of this burden. To be consistent, every gentleman on this floor who has spoken in favor of the Mills bill should give assent to the amendment I have proposed.

The tax on oleomargarine was imposed upon the mistaken and vicious theory that being an alleged unhealthy and deleterious food product its production and consumption should be repressed, and in the mistaken judgment of a large proportion of the membership of the Forty-ninth Congress this end could only be secured by internal taxation upon the article itself and by requiring licenses from retail and wholesale dealers.

But it was not properly taken into consideration that these taxes were nothing more nor less than a tax upon the consumers, and that these consumers were mainly of the laboring class, wage-workers, living from hand to mouth, the humble proceeds of whose toil were too slender to permit their indulgence in butter at the high prices which that article commands in the common markets.

It seems it was necessary to "protect" the "dairy interest," as represented by the Dairymen's Association—a "trust" of the very worst description—and which association, during the debate on the oleomargarine bill, openly and undisguisedly maintained a well-paid lobby at Washington to influence legislation which, by taxing oleomargarine and imposing licenses, would enable this "trust" to "corner" the market and maintain the present high prices exacted for butter. The poor people were forgotten in this unseemly scramble to protect the dairymen's trust, and the statistics of the Internal-Revenue Department show that, since the passage of the oleomargarine monstrosity, these consumers have been robbed under color of a mischievous law to the amount of several millions through the enhanced price which they have been compelled to pay by addition of the oleomargarine pound tax, and to what end and to what good?

It is conceded that the Government does not need the money collected from this tax. It is conceded that the tax has not operated to destroy or lessen the manufacture of this food product; and I am prepared to assert positively that this tax has neither added to, diminished, nor in any wise affected the condition of the public health.

It is possible that unhealthy or bad oleomargarine, or a product purporting to be oleomargarine, may be put upon the market in limited or unlimited quantities, but the same is true of all food supplies. As a matter of fact, it is notorious that more bad butter than bad oleomargarine may be found commonly on sale in all the retail markets of the country. Moreover, the question of the public health, as affected by deleterious articles of food, is a matter of police regulation by State and local authorities, and my own State, Illinois, enforces and maintains commensurate health laws in this particular.

Why should the poor, or people of small means, be compelled to pay tribute of more than a million annually in the advanced price of this food-product only to enrich the dairymen's trust? Why should an internal tax of such dimensions be imposed under the fallacious idea of protecting the public health when it is notorious that no such protection is needed, and when the proposition is clear and unassailable that taxation alone, unaided by police regulations, is not, never was, and never can be a remedy for even an admitted public evil.

The certificates of our most distinguished and expert physicians and chemists show that oleomargarine proper is not an unhealthy food-product, but, on the contrary, their analyses demonstrate that it is entirely healthful and furnishes people of narrow resources with an excellent substitute for butter. Of course its manufacture should be carefully guarded to prevent adulteration, but Federal taxation does not accomplish that end.

My personal inspection of the markets at Washington shows that 35 cents per pound is asked for butter of ordinary quality, while as high as 75 cents per pound is readily obtained for fine Philadelphia Print butter. Good, sweet, wholesome oleomargarine, duly inspected and certified, can be purchased at from 18 to 25 cents per pound, and the most numerous, the poorer classes, are necessarily obliged to purchase and use this substitute for butter simply because they can not afford to pay the prices which butter commands in retail markets.

The logic of the proposed amendment is inexorable. The President insists that all taxes upon articles of prime necessity should be abrogated and the free-list greatly enlarged. The collection of the oleomargarine tax costs the Government a large annual outlay. The Treasury is plethoric with its hoard of money, and we are endeavoring to apply a remedy for this dangerous condition. The Ways and Means Committee propose a measure of relief in the bill under discussion. Take off the internal-revenue pound tax on oleomargarine, maintaining the license tax, if deemed proper, and you relieve the laboring classes and people of small means from the exaction of a million dollars or more annually, levied upon a food product, an article of prime necessity, which so far has been imposed for the mere gratification of the dairymen's trust, without adding to the public health, but swelling the plethoric surplus of the Treasury to that amount.

The shibboleth of the hour is to relieve the people of all unnecessary burdens, and I submit that the pound tax on oleomargarine is the most illogical, oppressive, and unnecessary item of taxation burden ever placed upon the community. It is a robbery without reason; a brigandage committed wholly in the interest of waste and wantonness, and, so far as I have been enabled to examine the underlying principles of taxation by the sovereign power, is without precedent in the history of the Republic. Carried to legitimate conclusion in application to other food products of home manufacture, this tax would become a monstrosity and abomination almost justifying resistance by revolution.

Why thus grind the face of the poor and place the Government in the position of filching the earnings of the laboring classes, or indeed those of any class, by wringing taxes not needed for its support and where no other public interest is honestly subserved thereby? The oleomargarine tax is a fraud, a delusion, a snare, and a wrong, and should be repealed at once.

Mr. Chairman, in offering and advocating this amendment I do not propose to interfere with the license system which has been adopted for the protection of the public in regard to this acknowledged food product, which has been recognized as such in the action of the Forty-ninth Congress in the passage of one of the most vicious laws embraced in our recent legislation. This is a food product which the laboring people of our country—those who receive, perhaps, but 90 cents a day—are compelled to use. My amendment does not attempt to interfere with the law in regard to licenses of manufacturers or wholesale and retail dealers.

The proposition I submit is in keeping with the principles of the President's message. It is in the interest of the toiling masses who are compelled to use this food product, and who are now obliged to pay 2 cents on every pound they purchase. All that this amendment asks is that they be relieved from this taxation.

I have listened to what has been said during this debate on both sides in regard to the toiling masses. Here is a tax against that very class. I say to members on both sides of the House they can vote for or against it as they like.

Mr. BLAND. What is the price of oleomargarine now as compared with what it was before the law was passed?

Mr. LAWLER. It is about the same—23 cents a pound.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I wish to use the few minutes allowed me to oppose this amendment. I have for the first time heard that this honest product called oleomargarine is suffering from a "dairy trust."

The "trust" has become justly odious, and therefore this epithet is hurled at the diary interest here.

Mr. LAWLER. It is true they were here in the Forty-ninth Congress, and I charge that they were here as a trust. I charge it now.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Oh, yes. Charges are easily made, but in the absence of a circumstance or word of evidence to support such a charge they will mislead no one.

The influence which has been at work all this session to repeal this tax is the "trust" engaged in the manufacture of bogus butter from impure lard, which is palmed off on the people as the honest product of the dairy.

This tax favors pure against adulterated and unwholesome food, and its incidental effect is to protect the people against imposition.

That Congress has the right under the Constitution to impose such a tax is no longer an open question. That has been settled by the highest courts of the country. Nor do I think that the policy and propriety of such a tax admits of any doubt. The Federal Government has not power to prevent the manufacture of this product—but we can tax it. General Garfield in his speech on the tariff bill of 1870, said:

> First, we tax the vices of the people, if that term may properly be applied to some of their social habits. The smokes and drinks and chews of the people pay almost one-half of the taxes now collected under our internal-revenue laws.

Lard, and often impure lard at that, imposed on the people as wholesome butter should certainly pay its full share of the taxes.

To strike off this tax now would be an encouragement to expand this business to the detriment of the country and of the people generally. I feel sure this House will not countenance this. We should rather increase this tax than lessen or abate it. I yield my remaining two minutes time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. STAHLNECKER] to read some communications that throw some light on the nature and composition of the product called oleomargarine.

Mr. STAHLNECKER. In the interest of the workingman I desire to have the following letters read, caption and all.

The Clerk read as follows:

[G. Hutchison, analyst, soap and oil specialist, etc. 41 West Sixty-fifth street. Cable address: "Ingredient, New York." A. B. C. cable code used.]

NEW YORK, July 7, 1888.

DEAR SIR: Would it not be worth your while to purchase my bleaching process for the bleaching of palm oil, if for no other purpose? As by this means you can easily produce a fine, white, sweet material like lard, at half its cost.

Yours, truly,

GEO. HUTCHISON.

Messrs. JOHN P. SQUIRE & Co., Boston.

NEW YORK, July 9, 1888.

DEAR SIRS: Referring to my bleaching process, would it not be well worth your while to purchase this process for the bleaching of "palm oil," if for no other purpose? As by this means you can easily produce a fine, white, and sweet material like lard, at half its price.

I am willing to let you have full working details for $250, strictly for your own use, which is the merest trifle in comparison to its value for bleaching off-colored tallow, grease, palm oil, olive oil, etc.

Waiting to hear from you, I am yours truly,

GEO. HUTCHISON.

Messrs. F. WHITTAKER & SONS,
East St. Louis, Ill.

Mr. LAWLER'S amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 41. That this act shall be in force from and after July 1, 1888, and all laws and parts of laws in conflict herewith are hereby repealed.

Mr. MILLS. I move to strike out "July" and insert "October."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BYNUM. I move a substitute for the whole section. Before reading the substitute I will call attention to the fact that on yesterday we passed over section 24 at the conclusion of the administrative features in relation to the collection of duties.

The CHAIRMAN. There is a number of sections which have been passed over.

Mr. BYNUM. I call this to the attention of the committee because it is a part of this matter. Section 24 as it now stands reads as follows:

SEC. 24. That sections 3011 and 3013 of the Revised Statutes be, and hereby are, repealed as to all importations made after the date of this act.

The part I move to strike out is as follows:

And all laws and parts of laws inconsistent with the other requirements and provisions of this act are also hereby repealed.

That provision applies to rates and duties in the revision of rates as one feature of administration.

The CHAIRMAN. The question will be first put on the gentleman's substitute for section 41.

Mr. BYNUM. Let my substitute for section 41 be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 41. This act is intended and shall be construed as an act supplementary and amendatory to existing laws, and the rates of duty and modification of clauses, provisions, and sections as herein specifically made are intended and shall be construed as a repeal of all clauses, provisions, and sections in conflict herewith; but as to all clauses, provisions, and sections under existing laws not herein specifically changed, modified, or amended the rates of duty shall be and remain in full force and effect.

This act shall be in force from and after October 1, 1888, except as herein otherwise provided.

Mr. BYNUM's amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MILLS moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having taken the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue, and had come to no resolution thereon.

VETO MESSAGE—THOMAS SHANNON.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

I return without my approval House bill No. 5913, entitled "An act granting a pension to Thomas Shannon."

The beneficiary enlisted on the 31st day of May, 1870, in the Tenth Regiment of United States Infantry. On the 4th day of July, 1872, he was upon leave at the city of Rio Grande, in the State of Texas. Some of the citizens were celebrating the day, and one of them had a can of powder in his hand, which, according to the report of the accident, "was about to explode." The soldier endeavored to knock the can from the hand of the person who held it, when the powder exploded, severely injuring the soldier and necessitating the amputation of his right forearm.

Though this was a most unfortunate accident, it is quite plain that it had no connection with the military service.

To grant a pension in such a case would be to establish a precedent in the appropriation of money from the public Treasury which I can hardly think we should be justified in following.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, July 17, 1888.

VETO MESSAGE—WOODFORD M. HOUCHIN.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, on motion of Mr. MATSON, was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

I return without approval House bill No. 9174, entitled "An act granting a pension to Woodford M. Houchin."

The beneficiary named in the bill was enrolled September 18, 1861, and discharged December 7, 1864. He filed a claim for pension in the Pension Bureau December 22, 1876, alleging that he had a sore or ulcer on his left leg, "which existed in a small way prior to enlistment," but was aggravated and enlarged by the exposures of the service. This claim was rejected in 1877 on the ground that the disability existed prior to enlistment. In September, 1879, he filed another application for pension, alleging a disability arising from an affection of his right eye, caused by an attack of measles in September, 1861, and also again alleging ulcerated varicose veins of his left leg.

In October, 1886, the rejection of this claim for ulcerated varicose veins was adhered to, and the added claim for disease of the eyes was rejected on the ground that it was not incurred in the service and line of duty. On appeal from the action of the Pension Bureau to the Secretary of the Interior the rejection of the claim was sustained. The claimant stated in support of his application that about three months before he enlisted a little yellow blister appeared on his left leg which made a small sore, which existed when he enlisted; that while he was in Central America with General Walker he received a wound in the temple from a musket ball, and that he had also before enlistment been sick with the dropsy.

The case was very thoroughly examined by officers of the Pension Bureau, and a great mass of testimony was taken from numerous witnesses. Three brothers of this claimant testified to the existence of all the disabilities before his enlistment, and two of them stated facts which go far towards accounting for such disabilities in a way very discreditable to the claimant. Many other witnesses, with good opportunities of knowledge on the subject, testified to the same effect. While testimony of a different character was also given tending to establish the theory that the disabilities alleged were, at least to some extent, attributable to military service, the overwhelming weight of proof seems to establish, that whatever disabilities exist, are the result of disease contracted by vicious habits, and that such disabilities had their origin prior to enlistment.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, July 17, 1888.

VETO MESSAGE—THERESA HERBST.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, on motion of Mr. MATSON, was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

I return without approval House bill No. 8078, entitled "An act granting a pension to Theresa Herbst, widow of John Herbst, late private Company G, One hundred and fortieth Regiment of New York Volunteers."

John Herbst, the husband of the beneficiary named in this bill, enlisted August 26, 1862. He was wounded in the head at the battle of Gettysburgh, July 2, 1863. He recovered from this wound, and on the 19th day of August, 1864, was captured by the enemy.

After his capture he joined the Confederate forces, and in 1865 was captured by General Stoneman while in arms against the United States Government. He was imprisoned and voluntarily made known the fact that he formerly belonged to the Union Army. Upon taking the oath of allegiance and explaining that he deserted to the enemy to escape the hardship and starvation of prison life, he was released and mustered out of the service on the 11th day of October, 1865.

He was regularly borne on the Confederate muster-rolls for probably nine or ten months. No record is furnished of the number of battles in which he fought against the soldiers of the Union, and we shall never know the death and the wounds which he inflicted upon his former comrades in arms.

He never applied for a pension, though it is claimed now that at the time of his discharge he was suffering from rheumatism and dropsy, and that he died in 1868 of heart disease. If such disabilities were incurred in military service, they were quite likely the result of exposure in the Confederate army; but it is not improbable that this soldier never asked a pension because he considered that the generosity of his Government had been sufficiently taxed when the full forfeit of his desertion was not exacted.

The greatest possible sympathy and consideration are due to those who bravely fought and being captured as bravely languished in rebel prisons, but I will take no part in putting a name upon our pension-roll, which represents a Union soldier found fighting against the cause he swore he would uphold nor should it be for a moment admitted that such desertion and treachery are excused when it avoids the rigors of honorable capture and confinement.

It would have been a sad condition of affairs if every captured Union soldier had deemed himself justified in fighting against his Government rather than to undergo the privations of capture.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, July 17, 1888.

(The reading of the foregoing message was greeted with applause on the Democratic side.)

Mr. BOUTELLE. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. Is this bill a Mexican pension bill?

"The sum of $75,000, if so much be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury, for the purpose of building said new revenue-cutter."

Mr. CLARDY. That bill is, perhaps, not strictly within the order.

Mr. FARQUHAR. There is no objection.

Mr. CLARDY. I am disposed to take the action of the committee on it. If any gentleman chooses he can move to reconsider and then let the House pass on the question of our authority.

Mr. DINGLEY. I move the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the construction of said cutter shall be let after advertisement to the lowest responsible bidder, and that it shall be built in American ship-yards.

Mr. COX. I would like to ask the gentleman from Maine to give some reason for his amendment.

Mr. DINGLEY. I think this amendment has been customary in a large proportion of the bills.

Mr. COX. Have we facilities or plants in our ship-yards for the purpose?

Mr. DINGLEY. An abundance. We have never yet gone abroad to build any Government vessel, and I trust we shall never do so.

Mr. COX. I do not refer to yards abroad, but to our Government yards.

Mr. ADAMS. Is there any authority to build a revenue-cutter in a Government yard?

Mr. CUTCHEON. I desire to offer an amendment which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

After line 14, insert "that a steam fog-signal be established at Manistee light-station, Lake Michigan, at a cost not exceeding $5,000."

Mr. CUTCHEON. This was recommended by the Light-House Board, but the recommendation came in too late to be incorporated in the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

There being no objection, the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to establish additional life-saving stations upon the sea and lake coasts of the United States, as follows: One at or near Walles Sands, New Hampshire; one at or near Plum Island, Massachusetts; one at or near Lynn Haven Inlet, Virginia; two between Ocracoke Inlet and Cape Lookout, North Carolina, at such points as the General Superintendent of the Life-Saving Service may recommend; one at or near Ashtabula, Ohio; one at or near Marquette, Mich.; one between the Ocean House, south of the entrance to the harbor of San Francisco, and Point San Pedro, California, at such point as the General Superintendent of the Life-Saving Service may recommend; one at or near the mouth of Umpqua River, Oregon; one at or near Yaquina Bay, Oregon; one on Ilwaco Beach, Washington Territory; one at or near Gray's Harbor, Washington Territory.

Mr. THOMAS H. B. BROWNE. Mr. Chairman, this is the first measure of the session that has come before this House relating to the Life-Saving Service, and in advocating its passage I take advantage of the opportunity to say that there is not a branch of the Government service more deserving of encouragement than that embraced in the life-saving system. While as such its establishment is of but brief origin, dating back no further than 1871, yet in that short time we have seen it grow, under the able management of the chief here, with his efficient corps of superintendents, keepers, and surfmen on the coast, from a few small huts along the sand beaches of the seashore of the Atlantic, equipped only with ordinary surf-boats, to substantial and comfortable life saving houses, well appointed and supplied with all modern appliances in the shape of air-tight compartment surf-boats, life-preservers of the latest pattern, and manned by men whose skill and courage in the saving of life and property from storm and shipwreck has been not only the admiration but wonder of the country. We see from the last report of superintendent that the persons rescued from drowning and property saved is as follows:

FROM 1871 TO 1887.

Total number of disasters	3,852
Total value of vessels	$44,609,960
Total value of cargoes	$20,939,819
Total value of property involved	$65,549,779
Total value of property saved	$47,330,992
Total value of property lost	$18,218,787
Total number of persons involved	35,427
Total number of lives lost	544
Total number of persons succored	6,373
Total number of days' succor afforded	17,207

The loss of life includes 183 persons lost at the wrecks of the steamers Huron and Metropolis, and also 14 other persons, really not chargeable to the service, for reasons given in the report. This leaves the total number of lives lost during the sixteen years of the existence of the system only 347, out of 35,427 involved.

This is the return which the Government has received from the small outlay to put this service in operation. I say put it in operation, because it is not yet perfect, nor will it be so until every exposed point on both sides of this continent and the Great Lakes is supplied with stations, and more ample provision is made for compensating the skilled seamen employed and proper pensions granted to the widows and infant children of those who lose their lives in the service. To cover these and other needful legislations in the premises I have had the honor to introduce bills, most of which have received favorable consideration in appropriate committees and are now waiting the action of this House—notably that for the increase of the pay of keepers and surfmen—the former being raised from $600 to $900 per annum, and the latter from $50 to $75 per month—and there has been and can be no more meritorious measure for the consideration of this body than that for pensioning the class of sufferers named.

No sound argument has ever been brought against it. Such objections as have been advanced are purely technical and have no real foundation to rest on. They are such as that to recognize a person in any of the civil departments of the Government as a fit subject for pension would lead to the establishment of a civil list, which is undemocratic. With the example of the monarchical governments of Europe in this respect before us, there may be something in the objection so far as its general application is concerned; but when you have the grand spectacle of a man's losing his life for the saving of that of another, and doing it in the face of the risk and danger, and doing it at the bidding of his Government, there should be no halting and no delay in taking care of those near and dear to him left behind dependent upon the charities of a cold and indifferent world.

They are already in the land; on the coast of New Jersey they are to-day crying aloud, and from the land of Hatteras's fatal shoals the wail of the widow and the orphan is yet in the air; and now let us do justice to these and those who come after them, no matter whether undemocratic or not, and these brave men will be braver and the beautiful system more beautiful by the just act of a great and appreciative government.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Commerce what provision is made in that bill (H. R. 8181) as to the cost of these several light-houses.

Mr. TARSNEY. They will cost not over $5,000 each.

Mr. BURNES. What provision is made in the bill?

Mr. TARSNEY. There is none made in the bill, because the matter will go to the Committee on Appropriations for them to recommend an appropriation for the purpose.

Mr. BURNES. I insist, sir, that there ought to be some limitation, and that limitation ought to be based upon some estimate by the Light-House Board in each case.

Mr. CLARDY. I concur, Mr. Chairman, in the judgment of my colleague [Mr. BURNES]. The amount recommended is $5,000 in each case. I move to amend by inserting the words "at a cost not to exceed $5,000 in each case."

Mr. MORROW. I suggest the phrase "at each station," instead of "in each case."

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. I see no objection to fixing a maximum: but I supposed this matter would go to the Committee on Appropriations, who would report an appropriation after hearing——

Mr. TARSNEY. The Light-House Board makes the recommendation and adopts this limitation of $5,000.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. But the Committee on Appropriations will act on that recommendation of the Light-House Board.

Mr. CLARDY. The Committee on Appropriations ought to have some maximum fixed.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARDY] as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the cost at each station shall not exceed the sum of $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it pass.

Mr. WEBER. Mr. Chairman, I just came in and I would like to know the order of business under which we are proceeding.

The CHAIRMAN. We are acting under a special order for the consideration of bills authorizing the establishment of light-houses and life-saving stations, and right-of-way bills and bridge bills, reported from the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WEBER. What is the bill laid aside just now? Is it not a bill in relation to life-saving stations?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. WEBER. Then I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the gentleman's amendment will be entertained.

Mr. CLARDY. We can not wait now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can offer his amendment later. This bill as amended has been laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

LIFE-SAVING STATION.

Mr. CLARDY. I call up the bill (S. 1856) to establish a life-saving station on the Atlantic coast between Indian River Inlet, Delaware, and Ocean City, Md.

The bill was read.

Mr. CLARDY. I move to amend by inserting the words "at a cost not to exceed $5,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

House bill No. 8505, of similar title, was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it lie on the table.

LIFE-SAVING STATION, NANTUCKET ISLAND.

Mr. CLARDY. I call up the bill (H. R. 8752) to provide for the establishment of an additional life-saving station on Nantucket Island, Massachusetts. I ask that the reading of the bill be dispensed with.

There was no objection.

Mr. DAVIS. I move to amend by inserting the words "at a cost not to exceed $5,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WEBER. I desire to offer an amendment now to the bill H. R. 8181.

The CHAIRMAN. That bill has been laid aside with a favorable recommendation; but if there be no objection the amendment will be considered.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

Provided, That none of the life-saving stations herein mentioned shall be established or constructed until all life-saving stations heretofore authorized by law to be established shall have been established and constructed, except in such cases where the establishing of a station has been or may be necessarily delayed to acquire or to perfect the title to land required for such stations.

Mr. CLARDY. I object.

Mr. ADAMS. I understood that the gentleman from New York [Mr. WEBER] came in just as the committee was acting on this bill. I understood him to rise in time to ask what was the bill under consideration, and the Chair said the gentleman could offer his amendment thereafter. My impression was that the bill was not laid aside to be reported to the House, because the gentleman interrupted that course of proceeding. It was laid aside because the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARDY] said he could not afford to wait for the gentleman. I think it was laid over temporarily in order to allow him to put in his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is in error in one respect. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WEBER] asked the order under which the Committee of the Whole was proceeding; the Chair stated the business covered by the special order. The bill, however, had been laid aside. Objection is made to the amendment.

Mr. WEBER. I desire unanimous consent to offer another amendment; and I will say to members of the committee that I hope they will not force me into using the power which any one member may exercise to stop the proceedings. I do not propose, however, to be cut off.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to offer the amendment which the Clerk will read.

Mr. WEBER. If this amendment is acceptable, I withdraw the other amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That none of the life-saving stations herein mentioned shall be established or constructed until the life-saving station heretofore authorized by law to be established on Lake Ontario, New York, at or near the mouth of the Niagara River, shall have been established or constructed.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman give us some reason for that?

Mr. WEBER. The law authorizing the construction of this life-saving station was passed two years ago, but nothing has been done towards its construction. I understand there are some twelve or fourteen others, possibly more, that are authorized, and that it is left within the discretion of the Superintendent of the Life-Saving Service to establish and construct these stations as he pleases. The station to which this amendment refers was authorized upon the recommendation of the Superintendent of the Life-Saving Service, based upon statistics that were considered at the time reasonable and such as justified the establishment of this station.

For some reason unknown to me there has been no effort to construct or establish this station. At the time the bill was passed it was stated on the floor of the House that the required authority in the department to construct these stations we asked might not be due to immediate necessity. Attention was called at the time to the fact there were then twenty life-saving stations authorized upon which no work had been commenced, but it was also said it was necessary to have stations authorized in advance in order to have the work move on regularly and smoothly.

The objection to establishing more life-saving stations in addition to those which have been authorized to be constructed is that we pass laws here, but the Superintendent of the Life-Saving Service has it in his power to practically nullify them. I do not know why it is this station has not been constructed; and I do not see why the Superintendent of the Life-Saving Service should have any such discretionary power.

Mr. CLARDY. Has the money been appropriated?

Mr. WEBER. Yes; the work has been authorized and appropriated for.

Mr. CLARDY. Has any appropriation been made for it?

Mr. WEBER. Yes; two years ago $50,000 was put in the appropriation bill, and the same amount, I think, was put in the last bill. Mr. RANDALL stated that all the money asked for had been granted. There was no attempt on the part of the Committee on Appropriations to reduce the amount or to cut the Life-Saving Service off. It is within the discretion of the Superintendent to construct this station or not to construct it. We have passed a law requiring the establishment of life-saving stations and he puts them off on the plea there are others that are more necessary.

Mr. CLARDY. Is he not a more competent judge than any one else in the Department?

Mr. WEBER. That is a plausible way to put it, but I say that when the law authorizes and requires the establishment of a station it ought to be constructed at once.

A MEMBER. Regular order.

Mr. WEBER. I think we are on the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. This is proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. CLARDY. I do not make the point of order on the gentleman.

Mr. WEBER. This is the record, taken from Mr. Kimball's letter, in the report of the committee on the additional life station on Nantucket Island:

This office has a record of the stranding of fourteen vessels upon these obstacles within the ten years last past.

Here we have the stranding of fourteen vessels.

Mr. CLARDY. I do not make the point of order, but am willing to test the sense of the committee on the gentleman's amendment. I do not think other life-saving stations should be contingent on this particular one being constructed within a prescribed time. It must be apparent that the Department will complete the station as soon as it can do so in justice to other points.

Mr. WEBER. That is the reply I get from the Superintendent. The statistics show greater risks and greater necessity for the Niagara station than at other points where he has since recommended the construction of stations.

Mr. CLARDY. I recognize the fact we might embrace other stations which the people engaged in this dangerous service are asking.

Mr. WEBER. The record embraces other stations, but I see no other way to secure the rights of my people who have a better case. I do not see any reason why I should be set aside or that the construction of this station should be delayed.

Mr. COX. I wish to say to the gentleman from Buffalo that I think his amendment is unfortunately and unskillfully drawn. It cuts up other people without helping himself. He will find out when these life-saving stations are ordered to be built they are built at perilous points along the coast where vessels are being stranded, and when the money is given in bulk the Superintendent goes to work and places them where the necessity is greatest. In the absence of any report from the Superintendent of the Life-Saving Service, I would be inclined to fear my friend from Buffalo is mistaken in what he says. These shipwrecks develop the points where the stations are to be established.

Mr. WEBER. Does the gentleman want the statistics to prove what I have said?

Mr. COX. I should like to see them in official form. I have no doubt the gentleman by making his amendment in a different shape might carry out his idea. This service belongs more to the other side of the House than to this. I have known this Superintendent for many years, and I think the gentleman is wrong in making any imputation against him. But if he can draw his amendment in such a way as to call attention to the fact he states, I do not doubt that he will get his wish as to this construction within a reasonable time. I think that is the proper way.

Mr. WEBER. It is a matter that rests in the discretion of the Life-Saving Service, and I have done my duty by repeatedly calling the attention of the head of the bureau to it, but without avail.

Mr. COX. Well, let the gentleman draw up a joint resolution to give effect to the law already passed. I think that will accomplish his object, and I will be one of the very first to come to his support in the matter.

Mr. WEBER. I think this is the best time to get it done.

Mr. CLARDY. Let me suggest to the gentleman that I helped, myself, to pass that provision through; perhaps I drew it myself. I felt the same interest in that case as in any of the pending bills, and I trust he will not now insist upon the amendment, or at least that he will permit the committee to take a vote upon it.

Mr. WEBER. I regret that I can not accommodate the gentleman so far as permitting the committee to take a vote upon it is concerned.

Mr. CLARDY. Then I hope the gentleman will withdraw his amendment.

Mr. WEBER. I will not do that.

Mr. TARSNEY. You will not do that?

Mr. WEBER. No, sir.

Mr. TARSNEY. Then the gentleman is prepared to take the responsibility?

Mr. WEBER. I am.

Mr. ADAMS. Will the gentleman permit a suggestion from me?

Mr. WEBER. Certainly.

Mr. ADAMS. There is another way by which he can get justice, and that is in the form in which the appropriation is made. He says that an appropriation has already been made. Now, suppose it was made for the Life-Saving Service heretofore authorized by law, or in a certain order. It seems to me that the fair and proper remedy for the gentleman is before the Committee on Appropriations. It is the duty of the Committee on Commerce to provide for their establishment, but so far as the money to commence the work of construction and to complete it is concerned, it goes to an entirely different committee. The establishment has been authorized; now it is a matter for the Appropriations Committee.

Now, if the gentleman were to go to that committee and secure a change in the form of the appropriation, he should, if he persuaded them of the validity of the case, get an appropriation in such shape that the particular light-house in question would have to be built before the others hereafter recommended. I am inclined to think that the gentleman from New York would regret it himself, upon reflection, if he takes this course, thereby defeating the passage of other legitimate measures, when he could accomplish his object in another and more practical way.

Mr. WEBER. There is no practical way except by the grace of the gentleman who has charge of this work, and who pays no attention to any remonstrances or requests. The recommendations made to him have had no avail. He recognizes no authority but his own. This has become a law and he refuses to execute it.

Mr. ADAMS. In what form is the appropriation made this year?

Mr. WEBER. The appropriations are made in bulk; so many thousand dollars for the whole service.

Mr. ADAMS. Has the bill passed?

Mr. WEBER. I do not know.

Mr. ADAMS. Why not ascertain and have the appropriation fixed in the bill in proper form?

Mr. WEBER. I should hate to rely upon that bill.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, is it not a fact that this bill was laid aside?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. ADAMS. That being the case, I make the point of order upon the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. All this has been proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. CLARDY. I withdraw the point of order I made.

Mr. DAVIS. I renew it.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. WEBER. Of course I understand that the point of order can be made; but it is also apparent that there is no quorum present, and I do not propose, gentlemen, to be choked off in that manner.

Mr. CLARDY. If the gentleman is willing to defeat the construction of all the life-saving stations by insisting upon the amendment——

Mr. TARSNEY. Then let him take the responsibility.

Mr. CLARDY. He will take the responsibility of endangering the lives of many people.

Mr. WEBER. If the gentleman is willing to take the responsibility of endangering the lives of my constituents, then he is welcome to take that responsibility. I will not do it if I can avoid it.

Mr. CLARDY. You can easily avoid it.

Mr. WEBER. You can easily avoid it by consenting to this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is made by the gentleman from Massachusetts that the gentleman's amendment is too late, the bill having been laid aside, which point of order is sustained.

Mr. DAVIS. The gentleman is indebted to the courtesy of the House for the introduction of the amendment out of order. Now, having had the courtesy of this House for that purpose, he refuses to abide by the action of the House and places himself in a position of antagonizing all other bills before the House for the purpose of securing this one thing. It seems to me that in that attitude of the case, he is not entitled to the courtesy he has demanded, for he shows us no courtesy. He thinks he has us in a position where he can control us, and stop the passage of these bills unless he can secure one particular thing. I know, when he reflects upon his position as a member of the House, who had fair play upon the bill, he will not insist. I know the action of the Committee on Commerce during the last session and during this session of Congress has been most liberal and fair in the consideration of these bills. The gentleman's bill had fair play; his bill passed with the other bills, and it does seem to me that his present attitude ought not to be sanctioned by the House, and that he himself will withdraw his objection when he sees the position in which he is placed.

Mr. HERBERT. Let me make a suggestion to the gentleman: that he change the form of his amendment, and simply put in it a provision for the immediate construction of this life-saving station. It seems to me it would be a fair compromise to put his amendment in that shape and allow the House to vote upon it, and then go on and attend to business.

Mr. WEBER. Is there any practical difference between the suggestion of the gentleman from Alabama and my amendment as it stands?

Mr. HERBERT. Simply that the gentleman will not put himself in the position of saying nothing else shall be done if this amendment is not passed.

Mr. WEBER. I have no objection to modifying my amendment in accordance with the suggestion of the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. TARSNEY. I make the point of order that the bill has been passed in committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has so announced.

Mr. TARSNEY. And therefore the gentleman from New York is out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. That point of order has been sustained. The Chair has been indulging this proceeding by unanimous consent, in the hope that some agreement might be reached by which the public business could be transacted.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I ask the Clerk to read the amendment again, so that we may eliminate its objectionable feature and come to some basis of agreement.

The Clerk again reported the amendment.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, this is a very humiliating position in which to place this House—to take some one bill a gentleman may desire to have passed, segregate it from other bills, and say no other bills shall pass until this particular bill is passed.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order being made against the proceeding, the Clerk will report the next bill. The Chair will call the attention of the committee to the fact that the gentleman from Massachusetts made the point of order, which was sustained by the Chair.

Mr. STEELE. The gentleman from New York accepts the modification proposed by the gentleman from Alabama. If that be agreeable to the committee we can go on with the business. Calling up the next bill will not facilitate matters at all.

Mr. HERBERT. I did not understand the exact situation; that this was an amendment to another bill. My suggestion to the gentleman from New York was that he insert a proviso that this life-saving station should be immediately constructed, without any reference whatever to the construction of others, and allow a vote to be taken upon that.

Mr. CLARDY. I, for one, would not assent to the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Alabama. I do not believe we ought, on the testimony before this committee, to say to the Department it has failed to perform its duty in the manner suggested by the gentleman from New York. I know it is true in many instances these buildings have not been constructed for three, four, and five years; but I do not believe the gentleman's constituents are in any worse condition than people of other localities. Under the law, but ten of these houses can be built in any one year.

Mr. WEBER. Will the gentleman say upon his knowledge that since the law was passed establishing this life-station, other laws establishing other life-stations have not been passed and the buildings constructed?

Mr. CLARDY. I will not say. There may have been points that required immediate attention.

Mr. MORROW. Only at points where there was great necessity.

Mr. CLARDY. I do not know, of course. But I believe this to be true, that in the last session of the Forty-ninth Congress the bill was reported establishing this house.

Mr. WEBER. The first session of the Forty-ninth Congress.

Mr. CLARDY. You had an appropriation in the last Congress of $50,000, and you are to get an appropriarion this year of $50,000, and still you are not satisfied.

Mr. WEBER. I do not understand the appropriations heretofore made or to be made at this session of Congress will be of any service to me unless my life-saving station is constructed. There is no prospect whatever for its construction until the gentleman in charge sees fit to do it. For some reason or other he has not thus far seen fit to do it.

Mr. CLARDY. Well, the gentleman in charge of it is not unitormly neglectful of his duty.

Mr. WEBER. I have not charged him with neglect. I simply say that he has a discretion that he ought not to have.

Mr. CLARDY. Then let the gentleman amend the law, but let him not embarrass this bill that we have before us, and in which other people are as deeply interested as he is in his particular measure.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, in the Forty-eighth Congress—two Congresses ago—two life-saving stations were ordered to be established upon a most exposed portion of the Atlantic coast in my district, and they are not yet erected. Still, I find no fault with Superintendent Kimball, because I believe the condition of the business of the office is such that they can not be constructed at present.

Mr. CLARDY. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. COX having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. DOCKERY reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the special order and had directed him to report back sundry bills with various recommendations.

BILLS PASSED.

The bill (H. Mr. CLARDY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

ADDITIONAL LIFE-SAVING STATIONS.

The bill (H. R. 8181) to establish additional life-saving stations was taken up, and the amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union adopted. The question being on ordering the bill as amended to be engrossed and read a third time—

Mr. WEBER called for a division.

Mr. DINGLEY. I think there are other light-ship bills on which there is no controversy. I hope this bill may be laid aside until we have disposed of the others.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, this bill will be laid aside informally.

There was no objection.

LIGHT-SHIP OFF GREAT ROUND SHOAL, NANTUCKET, MASS.

ADDITIONAL LIFE-SAVING STATIONS.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8181) to establish additional life-saving stations, reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union with amendment.

Mr. TARSNEY. I ask that the amendment be reported.

Mr. CLARDY. I ask unanimous consent that we lay aside this bill for the present.

Mr. TARSNEY. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Suppose we pass this bill over, will it come up to-morrow in the House?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It would not. This is a special session of the House, and the business left undisposed of to-night will not come up at the session of to-morrow.

Mr. TARSNEY. Then I move that if this bill be not reached to-night it be made a special order for to-morrow immediately after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. DOCKERY. We can not do that. I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over informally.

Mr. WEBER. I object. I want to know the purpose of the request.

Mr. CLARDY. I will say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WEBER] that we have some other bills to which I know he will not object.

Mr. WEBER. I withdraw my objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DINGLEY. I move to reconsider the various votes by which bills reported from the Committee of the Whole have been passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, that order will be made.

There was no objection.

PORT OF DELIVERY, LINCOLN, NEBR.

Mr. CLARDY. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk informs the Chair that there are three or four bills from the Committee on Commerce on the House Calendar which can now be considered.

The Clerk read the following title:

A bill (H. R. 10636) to constitute Lincoln, Nebr., a port of delivery and to extend the provisions of the act of June 10, 1880, entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes," to the said port of Lincoln.

Mr. CLARDY. I do not know whether that bill is comprehended by the order under which we meet to-night. It is a bill establishing a port of entry, and I hardly think it is embraced in the order. I will, however, agree that a little later in the evening it may be considered and passed, and the motion to reconsider made, so that if the House should hereafter think we had not jurisdiction under the order for this evening session it may undo our action.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. As the Chair understands, the gentleman withdraws the bill for the present.

Mr. CLARDY. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the next bill on the House Calendar.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5032) to extend the limits of the port of Memphis, Tenn.

Mr. CLARDY. That is not embraced in the order. I understood there were some bridge bills on the House Calendar. I move that we now go into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, Mr. DOCKERY in the chair.

The first business under the special order was the bill (H. R. 5191) for the construction of a bridge across the canal entrance to the harbor of Duluth, Minn.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be passed over.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE BAY OF SUPERIOR.

The next business under the special order was the bill (H. R. 5192) for the construction of a bridge across the Bay of Superior from Rice's Point to Minnesota Point, Minnesota.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no request for the consideration of this bill, and it will be passed over.

CONDUIT PIPES ACROSS OHIO RIVER.

The next business under the special order was the bill (H. R. 8783) to authorize the Kentucky Rock Gas Company to lay conduit pipes across the Ohio River.

Mr. CARUTH moved to insert after the word "Ohio," in line 5, the words "and Salt," and to add "s" to the word "River," in the same line; so it will read: "across the Ohio and Salt Rivers."

The amendment was agreed to.

The title was amended to conform with the amendment in the body of the bill.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

BRIDGE AT PLATTSMOUTH, NEBR.

The next business under the special order was the bill (H. R. 10679) to grant the right of way through the military reservation at Fort Morgan to the Birmingham, Mobile and Navy Cove Harbor Railway Company, and for other purposes.

The reading of the bill was dispensed with, and it was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The next business under the special order was the bill (H. R. 10524) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Chattahoochee River, in the State of Georgia, reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

On motion of Mr. CLARDY, the reading of the bill and amendments was dispensed with.

Mr. CLARDY. I now call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 10604) to authorize the Winona and Southwestern Railway Company to build a bridge across the Mississippi River at Winona, Minn., and yield to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I move to dispense with the reading of this bill. It is in the usual form of such bills, and has the necessary safeguards usual in such bills.

The reading of the bill was dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. There are amendments to this bill reported by the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. The amendments make the bill conform. I ask to dispense with the reading of the amendments.

There was no objection.

The amendments were adopted.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CLARDY. There is a bill to constitute Lincoln, Nebr., a port of delivery, which I would like to call up. As I said awhile ago, the order under which the House meets to-night——

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk informs the Chair that this bill is in the House.

Mr. CLARDY. Then I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. COX having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. DOCKERY reported that the Committee of the Whole House, having had under consideration the special order, had directed him to report sundry bills with various recommendations.

BILLS PASSED.

Bills of the following titles, reported from the Committee of the Whole with amendments, were severally considered, the amendments adopted, and the bills as amended ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, they were accordingly read the third time, and passed, namely:

A bill (H. R. 8783) to authorize the Kentucky Rock Gas Company to lay conduit pipes across the Ohio River (the title of said bill being amended to conform);

A bill (H. R. 10347) authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near the city of Plattsmouth, Nebr., and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. 10679) to grant the right of way through the military reservation at Fort Morgan to the Birmingham, Mobile and Navy Cove Harbor Railway Company, and for other purposes.

The recommendation of the Committee of the Whole, that the bill (H. R. 10721) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Arkansas River at or near Cumming's Landing, Lincoln County, Arkansas, be laid on the table, was adopted.

Mr. CLARDY moved to reconsider the several votes just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CLARDY. Mr. Speaker, the order setting apart this evening for the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on Commerce does not, in its literal terms, embrace any other bills than those authorizing the construction of bridges, bills establishing light-houses and life-saving stations, and right-of-way bills. The request I submitted to the House to-day was that we might have authority to consider these bills and such other bills as there might be no objection to, but when it came to be ordered—on the question submitted really by the Speaker—it included only the bills in the order I have named.

I would like, inasmuch as it was the intention of the Committee on Commerce to have bills creating ports of entry considered, to have the bill to which I have referred by unanimous consent put on its passage to-night, and then have the motion to reconsider entered so that it may be called up hereafter, and the House can, if it sees proper, reconsider the action if in its judgment this bill was not included in the order. If there is any question then as to the authority to consider it to-night, that action can be set aside.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is inclined to the opinion that the bill to which the gentleman refers does not come within the jurisdiction of the House this evening.

Mr. CLARDY. But I propose that the motion to reconsider be made, and if the action is not warranted in the judgment of the House it can be set aside.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair can not entertain any requests except such as are within the order of the House.

Mr. STEELE. I think it would be just as proper to pass this bill as to run a gas pipe across the Ohio River. It is a small bill, involving no expenditure.

Mr. CLARDY. I do not want to exceed the order made by the House or do anything that would indicate a disposition to do so.

I will ask what has become of the life-saving station bill, No. 8181?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That was laid over informally.

Mr. DOCKERY. There is a question of fact connected with that bill which I desire to have settled by the notes of the Official Reporters. It was the impression of the Chair in Committee of the Whole that the gentleman from New York [Mr. WEBER] propounded his inquiry after this bill had been laid aside to be reported favorably to the House. The Chair is quite positive of that fact, and so stated at the time, but other gentlemen have different opinions, and I would like to have a reference to the official record to know the facts.

Mr. STEELE. There is no doubt that it was laid aside.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would state that there were three bills——

Mr. DOCKERY. The Official Reporter advises me that my position was correct, and that the bill had been laid aside.

Mr. TARSNEY. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. In what condition is the bill before the House at present?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill was laid aside informally, and is now before the House for consideration.

Mr. TARSNEY. It is unfinished business.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is, if desired by the gentleman who represents the committee.

Mr. TARSNEY. I move that it be favorably reported.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It has already been reported and is before the House for consideration.

Mr. CLARDY. I call for the previous question on the amendment.

Mr. WEBER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I understand the committee voted upon the proposition and that a division was called for. That, I believe, is the condition of the bill; is it not?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill was reported favorably with an amendment from the committee to the House. The amendment will now be voted on.

Mr. WEBER. I call for the reading of the amendment.

The amendment was read.

The previous question was ordered on the amendment, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

Mr. WEBER. On that I call for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 35, noes 4.

Mr. WEBER. No quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point of no quorum being made, the Chair will appoint as tellers the gentleman from New York [Mr. WEBER] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARDY].

While the House was dividing the following took place:

Mr. MORROW. While the House is dividing I will ask the Chair whether or not the bill I hold in my hand does not come within the order of the House. It is a bill relating to the transportation home by United States revenue vessels of shipwrecked seamen from the Arctic regions to the Territory of Alaska. As the law now stands, whenever an American vessel is shipwrecked anywhere in a foreign country, there is a provision of law for the return home of the shipwrecked sailors at the expense of the United States. But it so happens with reference to shipwrecked sailors in the Arctic seas that there is no provision for their return home.

The course of whaling in the Arctic seas is such that the last vessel that comes out is in danger of being wrecked, and sometimes is wrecked; and the result is that twenty-five or fifty sailors are left there and can only be brought out by the revenue-cutters. This bill provides that when the revenue-cutters bring out shipwrecked sailors, the expense attending their transportation shall be paid out of the funds for the revenue-cutter service.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will cause the order for the evening session to be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read the order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks the bill does not come within the order.

[Mr. BUCHANAN withholds his remarks for revision. See APPENDIX.]

Mr. TARSNEY. I ask unanimous consent that the pending bill be considered in the House to-morrow at 1 o'clock.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That order can not be made.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a suggestion which may possibly be satisfactory. I ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. WEBER] to withdraw his demand for a division on the motion to engross and read the bill a third time, submit his amendment, and allow the previous question to be ordered on the passage of the bill, which will bring up the bill before a full House in the morning. Then the House can vote on his amendment. If they agree to it he will be content; and if they reject it, he ought to be content. In other words, my proposition is that the previous question be ordered on the passage of the bill, with the amendment pending.

Mr. WEBER. That proposition is not accepted.

[Mr. LATHAM withholds his remarks for revision. See APPENDIX.]

Mr. CLARDY. I ask unanimous consent that all gentlemen desiring to do so may print remarks upon the pending bill.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The tellers report—ayes 18, noes none.

Mr. CLARDY. I move the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 9.50 p. m.) the House adjourned.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

JOHN F. BALLIER—VETO MESSAGE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read:

To the Senate:

I return without approval Senate bill No. 1613, entitled "An act granting an increase of pension to John F. Ballier."

This pensioner is now receiving the full amount of pension allowed for total disability to ex-soldiers of his rank.

Inasmuch as the bill herewith returned limits any increase to the rate fixed by law for cases of total disability, it appears to accomplish nothing of benefit to the beneficiary therein named.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, July 17, 1888.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The objections will be entered at large on the Journal. The question is, Shall the bill pass notwithstanding the objections of the President of the United States?

Mr. DAVIS. I move that the bill and message be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

J. T. VINCENT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the bill (H. R. 10356) granting a pension to J. T. Vincent, returned from the House of Representatives in compliance with the request of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

CRAIG'S IMPROVEMENT IN TELEGRAPHY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution offered by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] coming over from yesterday.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. BLAIR, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules be directed to arrange with D. H. Craig, of New York City, a suitable place in the Capitol building for testing his improvements in the art of telegraphy, with a view to the protection of the interests of the American people in such improvements if they shall be found valuable and Congress shall deem the same to be expedient, the sole object of this resolution being to facilitate the convenient examination of said improvements in practical operation and to involve no expense to the United States.

Mr. BLAIR. I suppose perhaps the resolution had better be referred to the Committee on Rules. It is a mere formal matter, as I understand.

It is claimed by this inventor that his automatic system is, in substance, a transition from the old hand system of telegraphy to one by machinery, and that it is really, for all practical purposes, a new system of telegraphy, or telegraphy de novo, you might say, because the old system must be completely superseded by it for most purposes.

It would seem to me that as he has the control of his invention fully, and seems to be a citizen who desires mainly to give the advantages of the system to the country and to the world rather than to make money out of it, while it is entirely uncomplicated by personal ownership elsewhere, it had better be investigated by Congress; for I am one of those who believe that when telegraphy is so improved that practically it supersedes the use of the pen in the ordinary business of life, it should be available to the world at large and not locked up in the hands of private individuals for the purposes of private gain.

Nothing is desired but the opportunity, without expense to the United States, to let members of the House and Senate see it in operation. There is in the room occupied by the press, near the reporters' gallery, a place once occupied by the Baltimore and Ohio system of telegraphy, that is vacated, and it is applicable for all the purposes desired. The control of a line from New York to Washington is already in possession of Mr. Craig, and nothing would be required except to make the attachment, and then there would be opportunity for everybody who might be concerned in behalf of the country to witness its operations.

I may state in a word all that this improvement is. There is a wheel which is connected with the development of the electrical current. The wire coming from a distant point is brought in contact with that wheel by a termination in the form of a metallic brush, I think. That completes the circuit. The message is prepared upon paper in the ordinary way, except that the paper is perforated. The character of the indentation which communicates intelligence is complete and actual perforation, and that is accomplished by a machine something like the ordinary type-writer, which cuts through the ribbon of paper. The message is thus prepared, occupying from five to ten minutes ordinarily.

Then this ribbon of paper with the message thus prepared upon it is passed by the wheel between it and the metallic brush which terminates the wire, and thus the circuit is broken, excepting as the threads or bristles of the brush come in contact with the wheel. Whenever that is done, as of course it is done as the perforated sections pass over the circumference of the wheel, the current is again complete and the message is transmitted. The rapidity of transmission depends wholly upon the rapidity with which the ribbon is drawn through.

That is all there is to it. It is very simple, and it is a system of telegraphy which must be almost as cheap as ordinary correspondence. If we are ever to take possession of the telegraph for the people of the country and of the world it ought to be done, it seems to me, at a time when there is some great transition in the facility of the process itself.

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] knows in regard to this matter, and as he has done more than anybody else that I know of in the direction of helping the people of this country to this all-important method of communicating intelligence, I should be glad if he would give us his idea in regard to the propriety of giving the opportunity to try the experiment.

I learn that there is not the slightest difficulty in affording accommodation. The Committee on Rules, I suppose, might desire the sense of the Senate before allowing a thing of this kind to be done, and for that reason I introduced the resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope the resolution will be adopted. The gentleman who has perfected this invention, as he thinks—and if it is what it appears to be, it is the most valuable and important addition to the art of telegraphy—is a person of respectability, credit, etc., and I think, in the public interest, looking to the future of postal telegraphy, the Senate of the United States might give this gentleman the accommodation of having a place to put this end of his wire in to try the experiment. I hope the Senate will adopt the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

THE FISHERIES TREATY.

Mr. TELLER. I gave notice yesterday that I would address the Senate on the fisheries treaty to-day. I find myself quite unwell and unable to do so. I will take occasion, however, to address the Senate on some subsequent day when I can do so without interfering with the business of the Senate. I understand that to-morrow is set apart for some special business in executive session, and therefore I can not do it then. I will not attempt to name now the time.

I will say that so far as the treaty is concerned, if it is the desire of its friends to press it to an early vote, I shall not interpose any objection for the purpose of making a speech. I am quite prepared myself, after the discussion which has been had upon the treaty, to vote; but if there should be an opportunity I shall desire at a subsequent time to say something on the treaty.

Mr. HOAR. I should like, with the leave of the Chair, to give a notice which I have been requested to give. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] just now stated that he did not desire to address the Senate this morning in regard to the fisheries treaty by reason of the state of his health. I will give a notice which I have been requested to give by the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE], who has that measure in charge in the absence of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], that he will ask the Senate to proceed with the consideration of that matter on Friday at the close of the routine morning business, and will then urge the Senate to continue the discussion until it is ended and until a vote shall be taken, without further interruption.

ADMISSION OF WASHINGTON.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business, that order is closed, and the Senate resumes the consideration of the Calendar under Rule VIII, beginning at the point last reached. The first bill on the Calendar will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. Order of Business 1414, a bill (H. R. 5870) to amend the Revised Statutes relating to the District of Columbia, for the protection of girls and for the punishment of the crime of rape.

Mr. STEWART. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill for the admission of Washington Territory. Let us get through with that to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 12) to provide for the formation and admission into the Union of the State of Washington, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was reported from the Committee on Territories with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the inhabitants of the Territory of Washington and of that part of the Territory of Idaho embraced within the hereinafter-described boundaries are hereby authorized to form for themselves, out of the Territory so bounded and described, a State government, with the name of the State of Washington: Provided, however, That no part of the Territory of Idaho shall be included in said State without the consent, as hereinafter provided, of a majority of the electors residing in that part of the Territory of Idaho embraced within the boundaries hereinafter first described.

SEC. 2. That if the electors of that part of the Territory of Idaho embraced within the boundaries hereinafter first described shall, by a majority vote, as hereinafter provided, decide in favor of including such part of Idaho Territory in the State of Washington, then and in that event said State shall consist of the territory embraced within the following boundaries, to wit: Beginning 1 marine league west from the mouth of the middle of the north ship-channel of the Columbia River; thence along the northern boundary of the State of Oregon up said river to where the forty-sixth parallel of north latitude intersects the same; thence east along said parallel to where it intersects the middle of the main channel of Snake River; thence southerly along said channel of Snake River to the northwest corner of Washington County, Idaho Territory; thence southeasterly along the boundary line between Washington and Idaho Counties to the forty-fifth parallel of latitude; thence east along said parallel line to the west line of Lemhi County; thence north along the western boundary line of Lemhi County to the crest of the Bitter Root range of mountains; thence northwesterly along the crest of said mountains to where it intersects the thirty-ninth meridian west; thence north along said meridian to the boundary line between the United States and British Columbia; thence westerly along said line to a point 1 marine league west from the mouth of the middle channel of the Straits of Juan de Fuca; thence southerly a distance of 1 marine league west from the east shore of the Pacific Ocean to the place of beginning, including all islands and parts of islands within said boundaries within the jurisdiction of the United States, with concurrent jurisdiction on all rivers bordering on said State so far as such rivers form a common boundary to said State and any other State or Territory now or hereafter to be formed and bounded by the same. But if the electors residing in that part of Idaho Territory embraced within the boundaries above described shall by a majority vote, in the manner hereinafter described, decide against annexing such part of Idaho Territory to the State of Washington, then and in that event said State shall be limited to the Territory of Washington, and bounded as follows, to wit: Beginning 1 marine league west from the mouth of the middle of the north ship-channel of the Columbia River; thence along the northern boundary of the State of Oregon up said river to where the forty-sixth parallel of north latitude intersects the same; thence east along said parallel to where it intersects the middle of the main channel of Snake River; thence down said channel of Snake River, following the boundary line between the Territories of Washington and Idaho, to a point opposite the mouth of the Kooskooskia or Clear Water River; thence due north, following said, boundary line to the boundary line, between the United States and British Columbia; thence westerly along said line to a point 1 marine league west from the mouth of the middle channel of the Straits of Juan de Fuca; thence southerly a distance of 1 marine league west from the east shore of the Pacific Ocean to the place of beginning, including all islands and parts of islands within said boundaries within the jurisdiction of the United States, with concurrent jurisdiction on all rivers bordering on said State, so far as such rivers form a common boundary to said State and any other State or Territory now or hereafter to be formed and bounded by the same.

SEC. 3. That in order to the formation of such State government the qualified electors resident within Washington Territory are hereby authorized after due proclamation by the governor of said Territory, and in conformity with the laws of said Territory relative to the election of members of the Legislative Assembly thereof, as nearly as practicable, and in so far as they may be applicable, and under such rules and regulations and at such time and places as said governor may prescribe, to elect seventy-two delegates, possessing the qualifications of electors of said Territory; and the qualified electors within that part of Idaho Territory embraced within the boundaries first described in section 2 of this act are hereby authorized to elect eleven such delegates, possessing the qualifications of electors under the laws of the Territory of Idaho, in like manner as is herein prescribed for the election of delegates in Washington Territory. The governor, United States district attorney, and United States marshal of Washington Territory shall constitute a board, whose duty it shall be to apportion, according to population, as nearly as practicable, the eighty-three delegates herein provided for among the several counties or election districts in the territory embraced within the boundaries first described in section 2 of this act, and such apportionment shall be stated in the proclamation of the governor above provided; said proclamation shall embrace and be applicable to Washington Territory and that part of Idaho Territory lying within the boundaries first described in section 2 of this act. And such proclamation shall further authorize the electors in that part of Idaho Territory embraced within the said boundaries first described in section 2 of this act, at the time of electing the delegates as above provided, to vote for or against including that part of Idaho Territory in the State of Washington which lies north of a line commencing at the northwest corner of Washington County, Idaho Territory; thence running southeasterly along the boundary line between Washington and Idaho Counties to the forty-fifth parallel of latitude; thence, east along said parallel line to the west line of Lemhi County; thence north along the western boundary line of Lemhi County to the crest of the Bitter Root range of mountains. And the question shall be submitted on a separate ballot, in the following form: 1. For annexation. 2. Against annexation. And a return of the votes so cast on the question of annexation shall be made forthwith by the proper officers to the chief-justice of the supreme court of Washington Territory, who, together with the two associate justices of said supreme court, shall canvass said vote, declare the result, which declaration shall be final; and the same shall be transmitted to the governor of Washington Territory, who shall cause the same to be recorded in the proceedings of the convention. If a majority of all the votes cast on that question are for annexation, that part of Idaho Territory above described shall form a part of the State of Washington, and the eleven delegates elected therefrom shall be members of the constitutional convention; and the boundaries of the State of Washington shall be such as are first described in section 2 of this act. But if a majority of all the votes cast on that question are against annexation, the delegates elected from Washington Territory shall constitute the convention, and the delegates from Idaho Territory shall not be members of or attend said convention; and the boundaries of said State shall be such as are contained in the second description in section 2 of this act, and the boundaries of the Territory of Idaho shall remain unchanged.

SEC. 4. That said delegates shall meet in convention at the city of Walla Walla, at such time as said governor may designate in his said proclamation, and, when organized, shall declare, on behalf of the people of the territory embraced within the first or second boundaries in the second section of this act, as the case may be, that they adopt the Constitution of the United States; and thereupon said convention is hereby authorized to form a constitution and State government for said Territory; Provided, nevertheless, That such constitution shall be republican in form, and make no distinction in civil and political rights on account of race or color, except as to Indians not taxed, and not be repugnant to the Constitution of the United States and the principles of the Declaration of Independence: Provided, further, That said convention shall provide by an ordinance, irrevocable without the consent of the United States and the people of said State, that perfect toleration of religious sentiment shall be secured, and no inhabitant of said State ever be molested in person or property on account of his or her mode of religious worship; that the inhabitants of the territory embraced within the boundaries of said State do agree and declare that they forever disclaim all right and title to the unappropriated public lands, and the lands the Indian title to which has not been extinguished by the United States, lying therein, and that the same shall be and remain at the sole and entire disposition of the United States; that all grants and patents heretofore made by the United States to settlers and purchasers of school lands therein are confirmed by said State and the people thereof, and that other lands, to be selected as hereinafter provided, are accepted by said State in lieu thereof; that the lands belonging to citizens of the United States residing without said State shall never be taxed higher than the lands belonging to residents thereof; that no tax shall be imposed by said State on lands or property therein belonging to the United States, any Indian tribe, or Indian sustaining tribal relations, or which may hereafter be purchased by the United States; and that all navigable waters within said State shall be and remain public highways, free to all citizens of the United States: And provided further, That all residents of any part of the Territory of Idaho which may be embraced within the boundaries of said State at the time of admission who are confined in an insane asylum, and who are maintained at such asylum at the expense of said Territory, shall be received into the insane asylum of said State, and shall be maintained by said State upon the same terms, in the same manner, and under the same laws and regulations as the other insane of said State: Provided further, That the said State shall be liable for and shall pay to the Territory of Idaho one-fifth of the existing debt of said Territory, and also the cost of keeping the Territorial prisoners of said Territory under sentence and imprisoned at the date of the passage of this act, who at the time of conviction and sentence, were residents of any part of Idaho Territory which may be embraced within the boundaries of said State to the expiration of their terms of sentence; and the Territorial comptroller and Territorial treasurer of Idaho Territory, four times a year, and at the commencement of each quarter year shall make out an itemized bill of the cost of keeping said portion of prisoners, and for the payment of one-fifth of the principal and interest due on the present debt of the Territory of Idaho, and shall certify to the correctness thereof, and forward the same to the auditor of the State of Washington, who shall draw his warrant on the treasurer of said State, in favor of the Territorial treasurer of Idaho Territory, for the amount thereof, not to exceed the cost rate of maintainiug and keeping said proportion of prisoners at the date of the passage of this act, and one-fifth of the principal and interest as shall be due on the present debt of the Territory of Idaho.

SEC. 5. That said convention, having formed such constitution as provided in this act, shall provide by ordinance for submitting the same to the people of said State for their ratification or rejection, at an election to be held at such time and place and under such regulations as said convention may prescribe: Provided, That the time fixed for such election shall not be prior to the Tuesday next after the first Monday in November, 1888.

SEC. 6. That at the election last aforesaid the legal voters of said new State shall vote directly for or against such proposed constitution, and the returns thereof shall be made to the governor of Washington Territory, who, with the secretary and chief-justice thereof and the president of said convention, or any three of them, shall canvass the same; and if a majority of the legal votes so cast in said proposed State shall be for said constitution, said governor shall certify the same to the President of the United States, together with a copy of said constitution and ordinances, and a copy of the result of the canvass of the vote on the question of annexation.

SEC. 7. That on receipt of such certification of the votes so cast at said election showing the adoption of said constitution by the people of said State as aforesaid, and of a copy of such constitution and ordinances, and the result of the canvass of the vote on the question of annexation, the President of the United States, if said constitution and ordinances shall conform to the requirements of this act, shall issue his proclamation declaring the State admitted into the Union, and thereupon the said State shall be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States without any further action on the part of Congress.

SEC. 8. That until the next general census said State shall be entitled to one Representative in Congress.

SEC. 9. That such Representative and the governor and other officers that may be provided for in the constitution of said State shall be elected on a day to be fixed by said constitutional convention, and which may be the same as the one fixed for the submission of the proposed constitution to the people for ratification or rejection as aforesaid; and that until said State officers are elected and qualified the Territorial officers shall continue to discharge the duties of their respective offices.

SEC. 16. That in respect of all cases, proceedings, and matters pending in the supreme or district courts of either of the Territories of Washington or Idaho, at the time of the admission of said State into the Union, arising within the limits of said State, whereof the circuit or district court by this act established might have had jurisdiction under the laws of the United States had such courts existed at the time of the commencement of such cases, the said circuit and district courts, respectively, shall be the successors of said supreme and district courts of both of said Territories; and all the files, records, indictments, and proceedings relating thereto shall be transferred to said circuit and district courts, respectively, and the same shall be proceeded with therein in due course of law: Provided, however, That in all civil actions, causes, and proceedings in which the United States is not a party such transfer shall not be made except upon the written request of one of the parties to such action or proceeding filed in the proper court.

SEC. 18. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported from the Committee on Territories.

Mr. CULLOM. I am not aware whether the amendment I propose to offer is in order now, but I think it is. I desire now, or at the proper time, to offer an amendment to the proposed substitute which has just been read, the amendment being in the nature of a substitute for the amendment of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Committee on Territories is a motion to strike out and insert, which is not divisible, but the part proposed to be stricken out and the part proposed to be inserted are both subject to amendment. The Chair understands the Senator from Illinois to propose to amend the part intended to be inserted.

Mr. CULLOM. I propose to offer a substitute for the amendment which has just been read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois to the amendment of the committee will be read.

Mr. PLATT. Before that is done, if I may have unanimous consent, the word "possess," in line 5 of section 14, at the top of the twenty-seventh page of the amendment which has just been read, should be "possessed." It is a little mistake in printing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is a verbal amendment and may be made without a formal motion.

Mr. PLATT. I ask that the clerks may correct it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The correction will be made. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] to the amendment of the committee will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to insert in lieu of the amendment:

That the inhabitants of the Territory of Washington are hereby authorized to form for themselves, out of the territory herein bounded and described, a State government, with the name of Washington.

SEC. 2. That said State shall consist of all the territory embraced within the following boundaries, to wit: Beginning one marine league west from the mouth of the middle of the north ship-channel of the Columbia River; thence along the northern boundary of the State of Oregon up said river to where the forty-sixth parallel of north latitude intersects the same; thence east along said parallel to where it intersects the middle of the main channel of Snake River; thence down said channel of Snake River, following the boundary line between the Territories of Washington and Idaho, to a point opposite the mouth of the Kooskooskia or Clear Water River; thence due north, following said boundary line to the boundary line between the United States and British Columbia; thence westerly along said line to a point one marine league west from the mouth of the middle channel of the Straits of Juan de Fuca; thence southerly a distance of one marine league west from the east shore of the Pacific Ocean to the place of beginning, including all islands and parts of islands within said boundaries within the jurisdiction of the United States, with concurrent jurisdiction on all rivers bordering on said State, so far as such rivers form a common boundary to said State and any other State or Territory now or hereafter to be formed and bounded by the same.

SEC. 3. That in order to the formation of such State government the qualified electors resident within Washington Territory are hereby authorized, after due proclamation by the governor of said Territory, and in conformity with the laws of said Territory relative to the election of members of the Legislative Assembly thereof, as nearly as practicable, and in so far as they may be applicable, and under such rules and regulations, and at such time and places, as said governor may prescribe, to elect as many delegates, possessing the qualifications of such electors within said Territory, as there are members of said Legislative Assembly.

SEC. 4. That said delegates shall meet in convention at the city of Walla Walla, at such time as said governor may designate in his said proclamation, and, when organized, shall declare, on behalf of the people of the territory embraced within said boundaries of Washington Territory that they adopt the Constitution of the United States; and thereupon said convention is hereby authorized to form a constitution and State government for said Territory: Provided, nevertheless, that such constitution shall be republican in form, and make no distinction in civil and political rights on account of race or color, except as to Indians not taxed, and not be repugnant to the Constitution of the United States and the principles of the Declaration of Independence: Provided further, that said convention shall provide by an ordinance, irrevocable without the consent of the United States and the people of said State, that perfect toleration of religious sentiment shall be secured, and no inhabitant of said State ever be molested in person or property on account of his or her mode of religious worship; that the inhabitants of the territory embraced within the boundaries of said State do agree and declare that they forever disclaim all right and title to the unappropriated public lands, and the lands the Indian title to which has not been extinguished by the United States, lying therein, and that the same shall be and remain at the sole and entire disposition of the United States; that all grants and patents heretofore made by the United States to settlers and purchasers of school lands therein are confirmed by said State and the people thereof, and that other lands, to be selected as hereinafter provided, are accepted by said State in lieu thereof; that the lands belonging to citizens of the United States residing without said State shall never be taxed higher than the lands belonging to residents thereof; that no tax shall be imposed by said State on lands or property therein belonging to the United States, any Indian tribe, or Indian sustaining tribal relations, or which may hereafter be purchased by the United States; and that all navigable waters within said State shall be and remain public highways, free to all citizens of the United States.

SEC. 5. That said convention, having formed such constitution as provided in this act, shall provide by ordinance for submitting the same to the people of said State for their ratification or rejection, at an election to be held at such time and places and under such regulations as said convention may prescribe, the time of holding said election to be not earlier than the Tuesday next after the first Monday of November, 1888.

SEC. 6. That at the election last aforesaid the legal voters of said new State shall vote directly for or against such proposed constitution, and the returns thereof shall be made to the governor of Washington Territory, who, with the secretary and chief-justice thereof and the president of said convention, or any three of them, shall canvass the same; and if a majority of the legal votes so cast in said proposed State shall be for said constitution, said governor shall certify the same to the President of the United States, together with a copy of said constitution and ordinances.

SEC. 7. That on receipt of such certification of the votes so cast at said election showing the adoption of said constitution by the people of said State as aforesaid and of a copy of such constitution and ordinances, the President of the United States, if said constitution and ordinances shall conform to the requirements of this act, shall issue his proclamation declaring the State admitted into the Union, and thereupon the said State shall be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States without any further action on the part of Congress.

SEC. 8. That until the next general census said State shall be entitled to one Representative in Congress.

SEC. 9. That such Representative, and the governor and other officers that may be provided for in the constitution of said State, shall be elected on a day to be fixed by said constitutional convention, and which may be the same as the one fixed for the submission of the proposed constitution to the people for ratification or rejection as aforesaid; and that until said State officers are elected and qualified, and until the proclamation of the President of the United States provided for in the seventh section of this act, the Territorial officers shall continue to discharge the duties of their respective offices.

SEC. 10. That from and after the admission of said State into the Union in pursuance of this act the laws of the United States not locally inapplicable shall have the same force and effect within the said State as elsewhere within the United States; and said State shall constitute one judicial district, and be called the district of Washington; that for said district a district judge, a marshal, and a district attorney of the United States shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, with the same rights, powers, and duties as provided by law for similar officers in the other districts, except as herein otherwise provided; that said district of Washington shall be attached to and constitute a part of the ninth judicial circuit; and a term of a circuit court and district court for said district shall be held at the seat of government in said State on the first Tuesdays of January and June in each year; and one grand jury and one petit jury only shall be summoned and serve in both of said courts.

SEC. 11. That the circuit and district courts for the district of Washington, and the judges thereof, respectively, shall possess the same powers and jurisdiction and perform the same duties possessed and required to be performed by the other circuit and district courts and judges of the United States, and shall be governed by the same laws and regulations.

SEC. 12. That the district judge appointed for the district of Washington shall receive as his compensation the sum of $3,500 per annum, payable in four equal installments, on the 1st days of January, April, July, and October of each year.

SEC. 13. That the marshal, district attorney, and clerk of the circuit and district courts of said district of Washington, and all other officers and persons performing duties in the administration of justice therein, shall severally possess the powers and perform the duties lawfully possessed and required to be performed by similar officers in other districts of the United States, and shall for the services they may perform receive the fees and compensation allowed by law in the State of Oregon to other similar officers and persons performing similar duties.

SEC. 14. That all cases of writ of error or appeal heretofore prosecuted and now pending in the Supreme Court of the United States upon any record from the supreme court of the Territory of Washington, or that hereafter may be lawfully prosecuted from said court, may be heard and determined by said Supreme Court of the United States; and the mandate of execution or of further proceedings shall be directed by the Supreme Court of the United States to the circuit or district court herein provided for, or to the supreme court of said State, as the nature of the case may require; and said last-mentioned court shall be the successor of the supreme court of said Territory as to all such cases, with full power to proceed with the same and to award mesne for final process therein; and that from all judgments and decrees of the supreme court of said Territory, rendered prior to the admission of said State, the parties to such judgments and decrees shall have the same right to prosecute writs of error and appeals to the Supreme Court of the United States as they shall have had prior to such admission.

SEC. 16. That the Legislature provided for in said constitution shall have the power to provide, by an act to that effect, for the transfer of all actions, cases, proceedings, and matters pending in the supreme or district courts of the Territory of Washington, at the time of the admission of said State into the Union, arising within the limits of said State, and not included within the provisions of the foregoing section, to such courts as shall be established under the constitution to be thus formed; and no indictment, action, or proceeding shall abate by reason of any change in the courts, but the same shall be transferred to and proceeded with in the State court according to the laws thereof.

SEC. 17. That sections 16 and 36 in every township within said State, and also all lands therein situate, by legal subdivisions of 40 acres, the larger portion of which is swampy or overflowed so as to render the same unfit for cultivation, or in case any of said lands have been disposed of under the provisions of any act of Congress to settlers or purchasers from the United States, or in case any of said sections 16 and 36 are fractional in quantity, or wanting by reason of the township being fractional, or shall be found, when surveyed, to be mineral lands, other lands equivalent in quantity thereto, in legal subdivisions of not less than 40 acres, to be selected within said State as the constitution and Legislature thereof may provide, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, are hereby granted to said State, when admitted, for school purposes.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I suppose it is unnecessary for me to state at any length the great inconvenience under which the people of a Territory labor while under a Territorial form of government, as it has been so often and so well stated by others; but I can not refrain from adding my testimony to what has been said. Having for near forty years been familiar with our Territories and having resided in one for a number of years, and practiced my profession in others, I have seen the operation and know the great inconveniences and hardships which are encountered by pioneer settlers in attempting to develop the Western country under Territorial forms of government.

These Territories very soon outgrow the form of government provided for them. Most of the Territories in the West are mining Territories. Immediately after their organization great interests spring up, important litigation is immediately inaugurated, requiring the highest skill and integrity for its determination. In fact, they become commonwealths almost at once, with as many interests to guard and as important interests as the older States. These mining Territories, I say, have important interests, at once requiring the very highest ability in the officers and acquaintance with the local customs and the people, and they could better be governed and they can only be governed by officers selected by the people themselves.

The two political parties have been declaring in their platforms that these Territories should have home rule, but neither party has ever fulfilled its promise. Men are constantly being sent to rule over them who are entirely ignorant of the locality and of the people, and of the matters to be considered; everything is new to them, and they are generally young men or men out of employment, who would not be assigned to like positions in the States from which they come; or, as a friend suggests, they are often broken-down politicians.

I am sorry to say that many of them are of that character. While I would not be willing to make a general assault upon these men, because some of them are very worthy, some have made good judges, some have made good officers, yet as a rule they are unprepared to meet the situation. They are poorly paid. Think of a judge receiving a salary of $2,500, which I believe is the average pay, sent out for a tenure of office not to exceed four years and liable to be removed by the President at any time, with questions involving millions to decide, in a new country where the expense of living is very great, far exceeding his salary! He is placed in a position that no judicial officer ought to occupy, a trying position, a position likely to involve suspicion. It is hard to make people believe until he has proved it by a long series of conduct that it is possible for him to be willing to sacrifice himself in a country like that, going there without sufficient compensation to pay his ordinary expenses. I say it is hard to make the people believe that he can be there for a good purpose. So he starts under great difficulties. There is universal distrust of him.

The poorly paid stranger who comes, if he is ever so honest a man, is unable to inspire that confidence which is necessary to insure good government.

The result is that the Territories are retarded in their development; that they are denied the ordinary administration of the law. They are treated as alien lands; as a sort of Botany Bay for the rest of the United States to which to banish broken-down politicians and needy individuals. They are treated in that way because they have no voice here; because their interests are not considered. There is much legislation that takes place in the Halls of Congress very prejudicial to the Territories, which never would take place, never would be enacted if they had representatives here and could defend their rights and present the situation to Congress.

Our land laws, of which there is so much complaint, might be remedied if these Territories were represented. Never in the history of the world was there such a confusion as there is in the administration of the land laws, and the country interested in them is generally not represented. Most of the States have disposed of their lands. It is not a living question in them. In the Territories it is a vital question with regard to their lands and their mines. If you look at the sundry civil bill, you will find in it an appropriation of $150,000, or thereabouts, for the purpose of investigating titles and prosecuting citizens, mostly of the Territories; prosecuting them by secret agents, and without a hearing, a system entirely foreign to all the traditions of the race to which we belong. Why they should be denied public trials in their own country, and subjected to secret tribunals, 3,000 miles away, nobody appears to know. The reason is, they are not represented in Congress.

It is said that this grows out of bad laws, and it is a necessity. Whether that is so or not this necessity ought not to exist, and would not exist if these people were here to represent themselves and see to it that the land laws were so framed as to enable settlers to acquire title and be protected in their homesteads. You do not want hundreds of thousands of dollars spent in litigation. What kind of a community do you think that would be with this amount of money spent to investigate their titles? Who can acquire title under those circumstances? I say the trouble is that there is nobody here to represent the situation.

Again, these Territories contain a vast amount of fertile land, but it is different from the land in the old States. The people of the public land States in the Mississippi Valley are unaccustomed to the situation. They are ignorant of it and unable to deal with it. This vast region occupied by the Territories, if cultivated at all, must be cultivated by means of irrigation, and a system of irrigation must be devised and laws must be passed which will enable the people to use the water in connection with the arable land, and by so doing homes for millions of people can be made. The lands when irrigated surpass any other in fertility, but under the present system nothing can be done in that direction. We want, I say, those Territories here to represent that great question.

Two-fifths nearly of the area of the United States and nearly nine-tenths of the public lands are in that situation and practically without representation. It is important that these Territories shall be brought in, and brought in at the earliest possible time.

As far as Washington Territory is concerned, there is a consensus of opinion that it ought to be admitted without delay. In round numbers it has a population of 200,000. I do not think that is an overestimate. I will not go into details. It has wealth and all the accompaniments of wealth to correspond; its educational institutions are well advanced.

It is inhabited by an enterprising, industrious people, who are developing the country. They are developing that country the best they can under existing circumstances and have built up a great commonwealth. It is out on the Northwest border. Probably there is no Territory in the United States with such diversified industries as Washington Territory. It has vast iron mines, coal-fields, and the finest timber of any part of the United States. It has the finest bays and harbors in the world. It has got over 3,000 square miles of bays and harbors which are unsurpassed in any part of the world either for beauty or for utility. The surrounding land about these harbors is covered with the finest timber in the world. It has much waste land in the mountains that can never be cultivated, but it has a vast area of good agricultural land, particularly on the east side of the Cascade Mountains, on which are the finest wheat fields almost in the world, raising every variety of crop.

It is fast growing, and should now at the earliest possible moment be allowed to take the place of a State and regulate its own interests. It should no longer be held as an alien land, to be subjected to all the disadvantages and inconveniences of a Territorial form of government. It has already outgrown that condition. It is an old Territory. There has been no sudden growth, but its growth has been steady and gradual; the development has been sure and substantial. It has railroads now. It has a system of railroads that is doing very much to populate the country. There are, as near as I can now remember, over 1,200 miles of railroad in the Territory, and that is enabling it to be populated rapidly.

Washington Territory proper has an area of 69,000 square miles and over 3,000 miles of water in the bays and harbors.

There is, however, in this bill a proposition to take a portion of Idaho, and that is the only controverted point in the bill. I wish to explain that matter to the Senate.

The Panhandle, as it is called, of Idaho extends as far north as the British Possessions It is a strip of land between Washington Territory and Montana Territory, averaging from 40 to 60 miles wide and about 300 miles long. It is on the western slope of the Bitter Root Mountains, which form the boundary line between Montana and Idaho.

The streams flow west from the Bitter Root Mountains into Washington Territory. The valleys of Washington Territory extend into the Panhandle, following these streams. The line between Washington Territory and the Panhandle of Idaho Territory cuts off the heads of these valleys and divides them. The market for this portion of Idaho Territory is west, following the valleys, following the railroads that run east and west, as the principal railroads do. Its market is naturally there; its business is all there, and the convenience of the people will be greatly promoted by allowing them to have political relations to correspond with their necessary commercial and business relations.

Southern Idaho is separated from this Panhandle by a range of mountains. I will not discuss whether those mountains are impassable; I will not discuss whether roads can be built over them or not, because almost anything can be done nowadays; but it is perfectly manifest that it is inconvenient to go south and cross these ranges of mountains to Boisé City. It is a great inconvenience and always will be to the people of what is called North Idaho or the Panhandle.

This is a matter that has been discussed for about twenty years. The people of North Idaho have been anxious to be annexed to Washington Territory, so that their political and business associations might be the same, so as to avoid crossing these mountains for merely political purposes. They have been very anxious for annexation, and the right of annexation has been conceded to them by Southern Idaho for many years and until the present session of Congress.

A bill for that purpose passed both Houses of Congress at the last session. It was reported in the House by Mr. SPRINGER, from the Committee on Territories, and the reasons which I have assigned and many others were given why a separation should be had. The bill annexed North Idaho to Washington It passed the House on Mr. SPRINGER'S report, and with the approval of the Delegate from Idaho Territory.

I will not follow out in detail the efforts which have been made by North Idaho for separation. The question has been before Congress frequently on petitions from North Idaho, with the full consent and approval of South Idaho. The Legislature of Idaho has passed several memorials asking that North Idaho might be separated from South Idaho and annexed to Washington, and finally in the campaign of 1884 both parties declared in favor of the annexation of North Idaho to Washington in their platforms. In pursuance of that understanding, Mr. Hailey, the Democratic candidate for Delegate, who was elected, introduced the bill in the House which I have already mentioned, and which passed the House, annexing North Idaho to Washington Territory. It also passed the Senate with the unanimous approval of the Committee on Territories. It failed to receive the signature of the President for want of time for consideration; it went to him at a late hour and it did not become a law.

In the Forty-ninth Congress the Senate also had under consideration a bill for the admission of Washington Territory as a State, which annexed the Panhandle to Washington. It was reported unanimously and it passed the Senate, but failed in the House. There appeared to be a universal concurrence for many years that this was a proper and necessary thing to be done. The Delegate who was elected in 1886, Mr. DUBOIS, stated to the people of North Idaho that he would be governed by their wishes, or perhaps he used stronger language. His language is in the report of the testimony taken by the committee, and is in print. They voted for him, as they say, with the understanding that he would allow their wishes to be presented fairly to Congress. At that time the question of annexation was submitted to the people.

The result was an overwhelming majority in favor of annexation to Washington Territory, and it was supposed that that settled the question. Mr. Hailey, the Democratic Delegate who was in the last Congress, so regarded it and urged the passage of the bill.

It has been suggested, however, that there is a change of sentiment on this question and that Northern Idaho now prefers to remain a part of Idaho and not be annexed to Washington Territory. This suggestion I do not think has much foundation. In fact I do not think there is anything in it. It is true in the northeast part of the Territory a few miners who have not a very stable or permanent interest in the Territory have expressed an inclination to go to Montana, and have objected to Washington on the ground that that was not a mining State, not denying that nature had designed it to be a part of Washington.

The citizens of Idaho County, which is the southernmost county of the Panhandle, recently held a mass meeting and passed a series of resolutions asking that this bill be passed allowing them to be annexed to Washington Territory. Nez Percé County sent a memorial in favor of it. Nez Percé County is the richest county probably in either Washington or Idaho Territory. It is a great farming county. We divided it by a special act and made another county by the name of Latah, it being too large. The Legislature having adjourned, there being no Territorial Legislature to legislate on this subject speedily, we made an exception and passed the bill about a month ago.

Since the organization of Latah County its citizens held a mass meeting and passed a series of resolutions urging the passage of the bill as reported by the committee.

So I think the feeling is as it always has been. It is a mistake to suppose that there has been a change of sentiment in regard to this matter. In deference, however, to the suggestion that there is a change of sentiment and that there might be no mistake, the majority of the committee have prepared a bill whereby the question whether this Panhandle shall be annexed to Washington shall be submitted to the people of North Idaho at the same time that they vote for delegates to the constitutional convention to form a State constitution. They vote upon this question, and their vote will decide it. If the people of North Idaho desire to be a part of Washington under the committee's bill they have an opportunity to become such. Under the amendment of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] they are excluded, and in that narrow piece of land are to remain a part of Idaho Territory and to suffer during all time all the inconveniences of their situation, and they are great. It is a question not only for the present generation, but it is for all time.

These mountain ranges will not change, the rivers will continue to flow in the same direction, following the order of nature, and the business of North Idaho will always be with Washington. If that people have a political association forced upon them with South Idaho great inconvenience will always be experienced.

As to the formation of new States, I have a word to say. While I am very anxious that there should be as many States in the West as possible, and while I want all the political power in that section of the country we can have, still I am unwilling that any State should be created hereafter that has not sufficient of agricultural resources to sustain such a population as will compare favorably with other Western States.

There is an allusion in the minority report that might indicate that I had some selfish or improper motive for desiring the Panhandle to be annexed to Washington, and I read from that report for the purpose of making a remark in regard to it.

There is another proposition—

The minority of the committee say—

There is another proposition, also, which is the sequence of the one under consideration. The last Legislature of Nevada, 1886-'87, passed the following act, to wit:

"The consent of the State of Nevada is hereby given to annexation to this State of any part of the territory of the United States which Congress may deem proper, upon such terms and conditions as Congress shall prescribe."

The act is indexed, "to add the south part of Idaho Territory to the State of Nevada." It is well and fully understood both in Nevada and Idaho that the annexation of North Idaho to Washington means the annexation of South Idaho to Nevada, and the obliteration of Idaho. The people of South Idaho are as much interested in the fate of North Idaho as North Idaho itself.

So far as that is concerned I have this to say: I believe that it would be for the interest of South Idaho and of Nevada that they should be united and form a State which would compare favorably with the other Western States. I do not believe that Idaho, whether the Panhandle remains with it or not, contains sufficient agricultural land to make it a populous State that will bear a reasonable comparison with the great States of the West. It will be a very small State in population, if it should ever become a State. It has some exceedingly good land; it has a fine climate, and when irrigated is as fertile, and perhaps more so, than any land east of the Rocky Mountains. It has many resources; it has a vast area of good grazing land, and its mineral wealth is perhaps equal to that of any of the Territories. Agriculture must be the basis for sustaining a permanent population in our interior States, and the extent of agricultural lands in Idaho, whether the Panhandle is cut off or not, is not sufficient to sustain a population that will compare with Kansas, Nebraska, or the proposed new States to be carved out of Dakota.

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. STEWART. Certainly.

Mr. VEST. I have not the honor now to be a member of the Committee on Territories, but there is one question presented in this bill which is a very serious one to every lawyer, and I simply want to ask if the attention of the Committee on Territories was called to it? I presume it has been, but the Senator has not discussed it in the course of his speech. The substitute provides——

Mr. STEWART. I should prefer to go on with my remarks, if the Senator wants to make a speech.

Mr. VEST. I only wish to ask a question, and what I have to say about the bill I will reserve to another occasion.

The substitute for this bill provides that the portion of the act which cuts off a part of Idaho Territory and annexes it to Washington Territory shall not become a law without the consent of the people living in that part of Idaho. Did the Committee on Territories consider the legal aspect of that question? In other words, it is a very serious question, and I myself think that the weight of authority is decidedly against the power of Congress or any State legislation to remit to the people the question whether a law shall become operative or not. We have not the power to do that, in my judgment; and neither Congress nor a State Legislature has that power.

Mr. STEWART. I wish the Senator would put that in at some other time.

Mr. VEST. I want to know if the committee have considered that question; that is all. Did the committee consider it?

Mr. STEWART. Yes, sir; and I have no doubt that Congress can make a law to take effect upon the happening of a given event, and it is very common to do it, and if you want precedents we can furnish plenty of them no doubt. I do not think there is anything in the point; but I will address myself to it if it becomes important hereafter.

I was going on to say that I believe it would be for the interest of Nevada and of South Idaho to be joined and form a State, so that there could be no criticism as to its resources or population, because, although Nevada has great mineral resources, although it has some very rich lands, although it is probably not exceeded in its capacity for raising stock by its rich grasses by any other part of the country, still the fact remains that the population must be small. I submit to the Senate if it would not be reasonable, while there is surrounding territory, to annex enough to Nevada to insure its comparative equality in population with other States. What object can the people of any portion of the United States have for keeping any State small and then deride it for being small? It is not the fault of Nevada that she has not a large population. Nevada was brought in by an act of Congress without her request. A movement was made in the Territory to make Nevada a State, and it was voted down by the people. Congress then passed an enabling act, and it was urged that it was important for the General Government that it should become a State, and under that view of the question the people voted for a State government, and they have maintained their State government honorably, honestly, and kept out of debt. They owe no debt now except the debt they incurred at the earnest solicitation of the Government, at the request of the War Department and of the President to furnish troops in the war of the rebellion, and they paid their money for them to keep the overland mail route open.

That is the only debt they owe, a debt which they contracted in aid of the suppression of the rebellion at the request of the Government when Nevada was a Territory, and they have paid the interest on it. They have paid cash for everything else since the State government was organized, and they are able to maintain a State government; but yet we frequently hear Nevada criticised. It does look like an anomaly for Nevada to be here with two Senators and New York with only two; but I say it is not the fault of Nevada, and it should not be made a matter of reproach if Nevada is willing to receive further territory and to become a larger State, so that there shall be no criticism of her unequal representation.

It certainly should not be a reproach to Nevada to be willing to conform to the manifest wishes of the rest of the country and avoid any criticism of any inequality of representation in the Senate. But as to the annexation of South Idaho to Nevada, I have this to say: As for myself, I never will advocate annexing any portion of Idaho to Nevada unless the people of that Territory desire it. I would not live with an unwilling people. I think we should be bad neighbors if we came together on such terms. But as to Northern Idaho, I think it for the interest of Southern Idaho and Northern Idaho and the whole country that it should be a part of Washington Territory.

It will be remembered that South Idaho is surrounded by Territories. It has a Territory on the north, a Territory on the east, a Territory on the south, except the part joining Nevada. If it ought not be joined to Nevada other territory can be united with it to form a State. It is a very serious proposition whether Wyoming Territory will not be a small State in population, although it has rich coal mines and many resources and fine agricultural lands, but the large mass of it is on high mountains where cultivation can not be had.

There is good pasture at certain seasons of the year; but there is a large portion of it in those mountains that must remain waste land. It is a serious consideration whether a portion of Idaho might not be well added to Wyoming. But that is not the question now under consideration. We are forming the State of Washington, and let us form the State of Washington so that it will accommodate the people and have natural boundaries. Let it have the Bitter Root Mountains on the east, let it have British Columbia on the north, let it have the ocean on the west, and Oregon, the Columbia River, and the Salmon River Mountains on the south. Let it have natural boundaries; let the people who naturally belong to the State of Washington be included in its boundaries.

Mr. MANDERSON. I do not like to interrupt the Senator; but will he, before he departs from this branch of his speech, state to the Senate the present population of the State of Nevada?

Mr. STEWART. I do not know that I can. I suppose the population of the State of Nevada is probably about 70,000.

Mr. MANDERSON. I see by the census of 1880 it was 62,000. Does the Senator think there has been no loss of population since the last census?

Mr. STEWART. I think not. That was rather a cool question. I admire that in a man who has the hardihood to make the insinuation in his report that Nevada desires more territory and more people, and reproaches her for it. I admire that, I say.

Mr. MANDERSON. In order to season the admiration of the Senator from Nevada, I should like to say that the quotation he made a short time ago is not complete without reading the legislation of the Legislature of the State of Nevada of 1886–'87. It then passed the following act:

> The consent of the State of Nevada is hereby given to annexation to this State of any part of the territory of the United States which Congress may deem proper, upon such terms and conditions as Congress shall prescribe.

The act is indexed to "add the south part of Idaho Territory to the State of Nevada." So the charge that Nevada wants a part of Idaho does not come from the report of the committee, but from the State Legislature of Nevada.

Mr. STEWART. I appreciate that, and appreciated it before, because when the Senator asked that question I suppose he asked it to show that we did not need territory. I suppose he asked the question as to population to show that we had sufficient population, without adding more, and that it would be a great incumbrance to have more territory and more population. He certainly could not have intended it as a slur upon Nevada. Why this proposition was rung into the report by the Senator from Nebraska, why he made a matter of jest that Nevada should be desirous of sufficient wealth and population to compare favorably with the great States of the West is fully appreciated. This weak attempt to belittle Nevada for the purpose of depriving the people of North Idaho of home rule is a new style of argument.

The fact that I or anybody else thought it proper to ask for further territory for Nevada is no reason why the people of the Panhandle of Idaho should be robbed of their natural and just rights. The desire of the Senator from Nebraska to violate every principle of justice, honor, and fair dealing with the people of North Idaho can not be justified by his labored effort to disparage the State I represent. Why should the Panhandle remain a part of Idaho after the platforms of both parties have declared it should not so remain; after the committees of both Houses of Congress have declared it should not so remain; after all the public buildings have been put in South Idaho with the expectation that it would ultimately be divided? I say there is no reason why the people of North Idaho should be deprived of their rights because Nevada has suggested that she might be willing to take more territory.

When that question comes up, and the people of South Idaho are willing to join Nevada, I can give many reasons why it would be desirable for them and for us. There are no high mountains between us. The pursuits of the two countries are precisely the same. We are a mining, agricultural, and grazing people, and the pursuits of both countries and everything connected with them are in harmony. The associations between us are in common. We ought to be united; there is no reason why we should not be.

There is no reason for making martyrs of the people in North Idaho for the purpose of having a Territory out of which a State may be formed. Other dispositions could be made of Idaho Territory.

What is the meaning of the talk about dismembering a Territory and destroying a Commonwealth? What is the object of it? The Territories are in a condition to be divided and redivided and formed into States. We are constantly changing their boundary lines. We are carving States out of Territories continually. There is nothing definitely settled until they become States. If more care had been exercised in forming these Territories; if there had been a better knowledge of the waste land of the Territories, of the proper boundaries, much evil might have been avoided; but when we come to form a State certainly these considerations ought to be taken into account, and we should not form a State in violation of them.

I would be perfectly willing to pass the bill as introduced by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH], or to pass the bill which was passed at the last session making the boundary permanent, taking in North Idaho, as the Senate did a little over a year ago. I would be willing to pass that, but it was only a concession to the suggestion that there had been a change of sentiment in North Idaho that this proposition was made to leave it to the people. It seems to me it is impossible for us in justice to do less.

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator state—for I do not know—the number of square miles in Idaho and the number of square miles in the Panhandle.

Mr. STEWART. The number of square miles in the Panhandle is about 24,000 or 25,000, and the number of square miles in Washington with the Panhandle will be a little over 90,000. When the Panhandle is taken off there will be about 60,000 square miles left in Idaho. That would be ample for a State, provided it was all good land.

Mr. BLAIR. Upon that point, would the remaining part of Idaho be substantially the same as Nevada now is?

Mr. STEWART. Substantially the same—the same kind of land.

Mr. BLAIR. United they would hardly afford more than a population for an ordinary State?

Mr. STEWART. United they would not have as much good land as many of the States, but with their natural resources would make a very respectable State.

Mr. BLAIR. Has the Senator knowledge of the local feeling in the southern part of Idaho?

Mr. STEWART. I think the local feeling in the southern part of Idaho is to hold on to the northern part of Idaho, and have Idaho as it is become an independent State. I think that is the local feeling. There has been a good deal of agitation there. The governor has been on here urging that the northern part of Idaho may remain with Idaho with a view of becoming a separate State. That is the local feeling at present.

Mr. HEARST. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. STEWART. Certainly.

Mr. HEARST. Are you perfectly familiar with the valleys of Idaho?

Mr. STEWART. I have been through them.

Mr. HEARST. Through what part of the country?

Mr. STEWART. I have followed the Snake River down to below the line and through those valleys. I have been in the Panhandle down to Lewiston. I have seen a large portion of the valley.

Mr. HEARST. Does the Senator not know that around Lewiston is one of the finest agricultural countries in the United States?

Mr. STEWART. Certainly.

Mr. HEARST. Leaving there and going up Snake River there is fine land, and when you get through the cañon there is a valley there about 600 miles long and 40 miles wide that would hold two or three million people. It has the finest land in all the world. Besides, there are many valleys running up into the mountains, which are fine agricultural lands, and that eastern portion does not need irrigation, as the Senator well knows.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to ask the Senator if there is any waste land in Idaho?

Mr. HEARST. There is very little waste land in Idaho. I should like the Senator to tell me where there is much waste land in Idaho. It abounds in rivers with large rich valleys, and the tops of the mountains are covered with the finest kind of timber. Take, for instance, the Owyhee River, with a valley 25 miles long and 6 or 8 miles wide, and Bruneau River putting into Snake River, with a valley 20 miles long and 5 or 6 miles wide. The Territory abounds in rivers such as Snake River, Clear Water, Pelouse, Pen d'Oreille, and Kootenai.

At the lower end of these rivers the hills and valleys are rich, and at the heads of the valleys there is the finest timber possible. The mountains, where there are mountains, are terrible mountains, but there is no better country for mining that I know of in the United States. But that is the very roughest portion of Idaho. I think it would make one of the grandest States in the Union.

Mr. STEWART. I am glad to hear such an estimate of it. It did not occur to me so.

Mr. HEARST. Certainly there is very little waste land there.

Mr. STEWART. I do not think you can irrigate at the very outside more than 10 per cent. of the land. I think if you could irrigate 10 per cent. of the land you would be doing exceedingly well. The other land is pasture land, ranges for stock. That does not make a State; it will sustain but a few people. We have had experience in Nevada of large stock ranges. You can not build up a State in that way. It is a very nice and a very lucrative business, but for stock ranges alone it is unnecessary to have a large population, and it is only the part which can be irrigated that can be brought under cultivation.

Mr. HEARST. But that is not the eastern portion. The eastern portion does not have to be irrigated, it is only the interior valleys, and the Senator will admit that it is one of the best watered regions in the whole United States.

Mr. STEWART. The Snake River is a magnificent river, and along that river for 100 miles or more on both sides the lava beds come near the surface, and there is a great deal of waste land there.

Mr. HEARST. That may be so, but Jack Gilmore staged over that country for ten years, and he tells me that the Snake River valley above the falls will carry 2,000,000 of people. Where that land is not rich it abounds in the best kinds of timber. It is the best timbered portion of the United States.

Mr. STEWART. I am glad to hear the good opinion of that Territory from the Senator from California, because he is a very good judge of those things. However, I think he overrates vastly the area of the country which can be brought under cultivation by means of water. It is a very mountainous country, and although the hills furnish good grazing, and it is a fine mining country and a rich country, I do not think it will ever sustain a population to compare favorably with the other Western States known as agricultural States. I think it will necessarily have a small population.

Mr. HEARST. If the Senator will allow me, I will state that I have been over all the Territories west of the Rocky Mountains as much perhaps as any other man, and I think Idaho has more agricultural land in it than all the other Territories there.

Mr. STEWART. I hope that is the case.

Mr. HEARST. I have traveled along all those rivers.

Mr. STEWART. I hope that is the case, and I hope it has enough to form a good State without inconveniencing the people in the north by retaining them in an unnatural political association. If South Idaho is not large enough, which it would be if the Senator from California is correct, and I wish he was, it is very easy to change the boundaries and give it more or annex it to some Territory adjoining.

Mr. MITCHELL. What proportion of the vote of Idaho is in the Panhandle?

Mr. STEWART. About one-fourth of the vote of the Territory is in the Panhandle, I understand. Whatever disposition is made of it or whatever reasons can be assigned, there can be no good reason why the people in Northern Idaho should be inconvenienced and placed in an unnatural position for the purpose of forming the State of Idaho or for any other purpose.

There is no reason why, when we are forming the State of Washington, we should not give it natural boundaries, as I said before, so as to have a good State. It will not be too large, but it will be a magnificent State with good boundaries, and when Idaho comes up for admission we will examine the resources of Idaho. I hope that they are all the Senator from California thinks they are. If they are I should like very well to join Nevada to it and make a good State, but if that can not be done, and if you want to make a State of Idaho, join something else to make a State, and do not do wrong now because something else may be done hereafter that is right. It is unreasonable to commit the outrage advocated in the minority report upon the people of North Idaho either for the purpose of keeping Nevada a small State or for the purpose of enabling Idaho to become a State, with unnatural boundaries, in view of the various adjustments that can be made beneficial to all parties concerned.

Mr. VEST and Mr. CULLOM addressed the Chair.

Mr. CULLOM. Does the Senator from Missouri desire to address the Senate?

Mr. VEST. Yes; briefly in regard to the point I made while the Senator from Nevada was speaking.

Mr. CULLOM. I am informed that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH], who is on a conference committee, is desirous of making some remarks early, so that he may have an opportunity to go to the conference committee, and I had agreed to yield to him for that purpose. I am willing that the Senator from Missouri shall address the Senate if the Senator from Oregon does not wish to go on now.

Mr. VEST. I have no speech to make to the Senate. I only saw the substitute this morning.

Mr. CULLOM. I desire to address the Senate myself eventually.

Mr. VEST. I want to criticise some of its provisions.

Mr. DOLPH. If the Senator from Missouri wishes to go on now I shall not insist on the floor.

Mr. VEST. It would be just as convenient to me at any other time as now. Probably it would be better for the Senator from Oregon, if he proposes to defend the substitute, as he is a lawyer, that he should hear what I have to say about it.

Mr. DOLPH. I do not propose to speak specially upon that point, and my remarks are prepared.

Mr. VEST. I shall consult the Senator's convenience.

Mr. DOLPH. If just as convenient to the Senator from Missouri, I will proceed.

Mr. VEST. Very well.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, at the first session of the Forty-ninth Congress, when the bill for the admission of Washington Territory into the Union was under consideration, I addressed the Senate at some length and endeavored to show that whether the action of Congress in admitting a new State should be governed by the precedents, or there is no rule that requires as a matter of right the admission of a Territory when possessed of a given population, there was in the case of Washington Territory no one thing wanting which could reasonably be required as a prerequisite to admission.

I then showed that the area of the proposed State would be in round numbers 90,000 square miles, an area exceeded only by five States of the Union; that by a careful estimate based upon the vote of the Territory for a number of years and upon the last census, the population of Washington Territory and that portion of Idaho included within the boundaries of the proposed State on the 4th day of November, 1884, was not less than 182,000, and that not one of the new States had had at the time of their admission a population as great as that of the proposed State of Washington.

I also endeavored to show that in intelligence, education, thrift, moral worth, and all the qualities which go to make good citizens, the people of Washington Territory compared favorably with the people of older communities; that the resources of the Territory were varied and great, and with its mild climate in winter, its considerable area of rich agricultural lands, its vast forests of valuable timber, its rich mines of coal, iron, and copper, as well as of the precious metals, and its splendid system of water transportation, it was bound to become one of the most wealthy and prosperous States of the Union.

I called attention to the great commercial importance of the Territory to the fact that Puget Sound was the western terminus of two great continental lines of railroad, and that it was situated on the direct line of commerce from China and Japan across the continent to New York, Boston, Liverpool, and the continent of Europe, and I endeavored to maintain the proposition that under the provisions of the organic act of the original Oregon Territory, which contained a clause guarantying to the people of the Territory the rights, privileges, and advantages granted and secured to the people of the Territory northwest of the Ohio by the ordinance of 1787, the people of Washington Territory had a right to admission as a State of the Union when the Territory possessed a population of 60,000. Since that time official and other reports more than confirm all that I then said about the growth and prosperity of the Territory. Its population has rapidly increased, and is at this time in round numbers 250,000; the development of its resources has continued; its agricultural, mining, and lumbering interests are flourishing, and new lines of railroad are being constructed.

I shall not at this time enter at length upon the subject of the fitness of the Territory for statehood. To do so would be, to a considerable extent, to repeat what I then said, and there is not a member of either branch of Congress who will have the hardihood to deny that the Territory possesses all the qualifications which have heretofore been considered requisite to admission. Nevertheless the bill which passed the Senate during the last Congress failed to receive consideration in the House, and this one, I fear, will not be more fortunate. There is a more powerful argument for the continued rejection by the majority of the House of the application of the Territory for admission than any arguments which can be presented based upon the admitted facts showing its fitness for statehood. The Senator from South Carolina disclosed it in his speech upon the bill for the admission of South Dakota when he said that the adoption of the report of the majority of the committee would admit at once two Senators on this floor, and again, to quote his own words:

> Whilst I would not put my opposition to the admission of any Territory upon the ground that its people differed with me in political sentiment, I couple that statement with the further statement that I never will consent, if I can prevent it, to any party getting by a snap judgment a political advantage in a body where their political supremacy is rapidly waning.

Here lies the objection to the admission of Washington as well as of Dakota. Does any one imagine for a moment that if Senators upon the other side of this Chamber felt sure that the new State would elect Democratic Senators there would be any objection to authorizing the President by proclamation to admit her when she had adopted a constitution republican in form? What assurance would the people of the Territory have if Congress, instead of providing for the admission of the Territory, passes an enabling act, that after they had held a convention and adopted a constitution and applied for admission their application would not be treated as the one already made has been?

Is there any one who supposes that if she should present an unobjectionable constitution, but elect Republican Senators, she would be admitted with the two Houses of Congress constituted as they are now? I think not. The bill under consideration is fair to both parties. It leaves the people free to express their political sentiments at the polls without fear of their application for admission being refused on account of the result. It is in accordance with the precedents. What objection can be made to it if it is in good faith proposed to admit the Territory? The fact is the proposition to pass an enabling act is well adapted for the purpose of gaining time, making a show of doing something, but keeping the Territory out of the Union and experimenting to see if two Democratic Senators can not be secured.

Washington alone has sufficient territory for a great and powerful State, and while I have heretofore favored and am inclined to vote again for the incorporation of Northern Idaho in the new State, I consider the large area which the new State would have as the most important objection to it, an objection of the same character as that to the admission of Dakota as a whole. Equality is equity. Equality of representation in the House of Representatives is secured under the Constitution by representation based upon population. In the Senate the States are equal in representation, no matter what their area or population. When a State is once admitted into the Union neither the State nor the General Government alone can change its boundaries or increase or decrease its territory. The relation of the State to the Union is permanent. The original thirteen States were organized governments before the Union was formed and when the Constitution was adopted, and necessarily came into the Union with their then existing territory, but as to new States carved out of the territory ceded to the United States by the States or afterwards acquired by cession it is evident the question of the size of the new States is important not alone to the people of the new State but to every other State in the Union.

The great Northwest, which will in time become as densely populated as any portion of the Union, and which has equal demands upon the General Government, is entitled to such a division of the territory of the United States into States as will secure to it fair representation in the Senate.

I discussed this question to some extent in a speech while the bill for the admission of Washington Territory into the Union was under consideration during the Forty-ninth Congress, and showed that if Washington is admitted into the Union there will be three Pacific coast States with a shore line upon the Pacific of 1,620 miles with six Senators, while upon the Atlantic, from the northern boundary of Maine to the southern boundary of Georgia, a distance of 1,450 miles, there are thirteen States bounded in whole or in part by the Atlantic Ocean, and represented in the United States Senate by twenty-six Senators; that California has an area of 157,801 square miles; Oregon, 95,274; and Washington Territory, 69,994 square miles, an aggregate of 323,069 square miles, while the thirteen States upon the Atlantic coast, namely, Maine, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia have an area of nearly 309,652 square miles; that when Washington, Idaho, Utah, and Arizona Territories are admitted, there will be seven States west of the Rocky Mountains with an area of 776,334 square miles, while east of the Rocky Mountains there are at present thirty-five States, and that seven more will probably be created out of the Territories, and possibly three additional States by the division of Texas, in which case there would be seven Pacific States with 776,334 square miles and forty-five States with 2,232,283 square miles east of the Rocky Mountains and within the boundaries of New Mexico and Colorado.

This is an inequality of representation which can not be prevented, but which should not be extended to other portions of the Northwest.

Until a comparatively recent period the people of Northern Idaho have been practically unanimous for annexation to Washington Territory and in their desire for admission into the Union as a portion of the new State. They were dissatisfied with the boundaries of the Territory when Idaho was organized. As that Territory was organized the northern portion consisted of a narrow strip of land west of the Bitter Root Mountains. When Montana was organized, in 1864, including a portion of Idaho, the crest of the Bitter Root Mountains was made the boundary between Montana and Idaho, leaving the northern portion of Idaho only about 40 miles in width. A considerable portion of this narrow strip consists of spurs of the Bitter Root Mountains, not suitable for cultivation. This narrow strip is a portion of the basin of the Columbia River, and naturally belongs to Washington Territory.

In the act of the Legislative Assembly of Washington Territory, authorizing the calling of a convention to form a State constitution, delegates were invited from the northern counties of Idaho to participate in the convention, with a view to including those counties within the new States. Delegates were chosen and a constitution framed by the convention which included within the boundaries of the proposed State the three northern counties of Idaho. The constitution was submitted to the people of Washington and to the people of North Idaho. It was adopted by more than a two-thirds vote in Washington Territory, and in Northern Idaho only 38 votes out of 800 were cast against it.

The memorial adopted by the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Washington in November, 1883, praying for admission into the Union, asked Congress to include within the boundaries of the new State the northern counties of Idaho.

The question of annexation of Idaho to Washington Territory when admitted as a State was again submitted to the people of North Idaho at the general election of 1880, and 1,216 votes were polled for annexation, and only 7 against it.

In 1884 the platforms adopted by both the Republican and Democratic Territorial conventions contained a resolution favoring annexation. The following is a copy of the resolution adopted by the Republican convention:

> Resolved, That the wishes of the people of North Idaho in regard to annexation to Washington Territory should be faithfully and justly represented. It is a question of local importance with the people of that section, and demands recognition and support in proportion to the unanimity of their expression of that subject.

Also, I read upon the same subject a resolution adopted by the Democratic Territorial convention of the same year, which is as follows:

> Resolved, That we recognize the full right, justness, importance, and final result of the claim of our citizens of Northern Idaho in their annexation views; and here in open convention, backed by an honest Democracy, we pledge to our northern neighbors a willingness and co-operation on our part to accede to their wishes on this proposition in a mutuality of feeling that shall bind us together fraternally now and sow the seeds of eternal friendship when the separation may come; and we ask our northern friends to accept this pledge in the honesty of its intention and with the full assurance that it is based upon the promise of a permanent resident political organization, and not the imported vibrations of homeless, faithless, wandering political mendicants.

The reasons for desiring that Northern Idaho should be annexed to Washington are stated in a petition of a committee of citizens of North Idaho, as follows:

> First. The union of North and South Idaho is, and always has been, disastrous to all the material interests of the people of the northern part of the Territory. If the imaginary line now constituting the western boundary of North Idaho were abrogated and this section restored to its original and natural position as a part of Washington, the value of the property of her citizens would be increased by hundreds of thousands of dollars. Immigration now stops within Washington Territory and crosses into Idaho with reluctance. With agricultural resources unsurpassed, except in extent, the development of these resources is retarded beyond a present power of computation by reason of our isolated condition consequent upon a political connection with a section with which we are as practically separated as from any State in the Union. To remain thus permanently severed from the basin of the Columbia, of which we are naturally a part, is and will always continue to be absolutely ruinous to our prosperity.
> Second. North and South Idaho are separated by natural boundaries. Between the two is a mountain range, impassable except on horseback or on foot over rugged mountain trails in the summer and in the winter except on snow-shoes. There never has been a wagon-road and never can be a practical one between the two. The Salmon River Mountains, which constitutes this barrier, are at least 60 miles in width, extending east and west, across the entire Territory.
> Third. The only routes of travel between the two, by private or public conveyance, except as before stated, is by a wide detour westward through Washington Territory and the State of Oregon, over the Blue Mountains, or still farther, by water and rail to Portland and San Francisco, through Washington Territory and the States of Oregon and California, via the Central Pacific road. Within the limits of the Territory there is no communication between the two sections except by mountain trail, as before stated.
> Fourth. Our remoteness from the seat of the Idaho Territorial government deprives us of all the protection which a government should afford to every section of its domain. North Idaho, with a comparatively small area, is the present home of a large number of Indians. In it are the Nez Percé, Cœur d'Alene, Pend d'Oreille, a part of Kootenai, permanently, and the Spokane roam through the northern portion thereof. There are no prospects of these tribes being removed to other localities. We are subject, therefore, in the future, as we have been in the past, to sudden and cruel savage outbreaks. When the Indian war under Chief Joseph broke upon our people in 1877 we appealed to the governor, an energetic and faithful executive, for aid, but his reply was, "That he had no arms that he could spare for so long a distance, and that aid could reach us from other sources sooner than from Boisé, our capital." General Howard attempted to aid us by a command sent from South Idaho through the nearest and most accessible route. This command, under a brave and energetic officer, pushed forward with the utmost dispatch until it reached the southern base of the Salmon River Mountains, within 80 miles of our people. It sought to make a wagon-road and cross this barrier, but was obliged to turn back before the difficulties of this mountain range. Although within 80 miles of the point where men, women, and children were being massacred with savage cruelty this command was obliged to leave our people to their fate and to come to our rescue, if at all, by passing through Oregon and Washington, a distance of not less than 600 miles.

Governor Ferry, of Washington Territory, came at once to our aid, and though beyond the jurisdiction of his Territory loaned us arms and munitions of war. Thus this savage warfare was staid by aid from the Territory to which we ask to be annexed, and could naturally come from no other source. What occurred in 1877 may occur at any time in the future. The government in South Idaho can only draw a revenue from our taxable property, while it can afford us no protection from impending danger. The capital of the Territory was removed from Lewiston, in North Idaho, to Boisé, in South Idaho, in 1875. Since that time, a period of seventeen years, no Territorial officer has ever been within the limits of the territory sought to be annexed, and none have had any actual practical knowledge of our condition. This has not been the result of a want of energy or a lack of interest on the part of these gentlemen in the welfare of our people. It is simply the result of the difficulties of intercourse between the two sections which nature has made nearly insurmountable.

Fifth. The political union of these two sections of Idaho renders it necessary to travel over the above-described routes from this northern section to the capital at a great expense and at a great distance by stage, and in the winter season at considerable danger to life and health, while the union of North Idaho with the State of Washington would make access to the seat of government expeditious, easy, and convenient by rail or river navigation.

Sixth. Between North and South Idaho there is and can be no commercial intercourse. Neither has the products which find a market in the other, and no routes of transportation from either section to the markets of the world passes through the other. The products of North Idaho have hitherto passed westward to the Pacific, and will in future take the same course unless a portion pass over the North Pacific road to Eastern markets.

Seventh. No material or political interest of South Idaho will be affected by the annexation of North Idaho to Washington. All her resources could be harmoniously developed. It is claimed by those opposed to annexation that the severance of North Idaho would leave the Territory subject to Mormon rule. This plea is fallacious and designed simply to prejudice the minds of those not acquainted with the facts. Bear Lake County, in the extreme southeastern corner of the Territory, is the only one where the Mormon influence is dominant. In Oneida County, joining Bear Lake on the west, the political power of the Mormon and anti-Mormon, known there as the Gentile influence, has always been and now is nearly equally divided—so nearly equal that the county officers and representatives in the Territorial Legislature have been about equally divided. Cassia County, joining Oneida on the west, has a considerable but not a controlling Mormon vote. These three counties, located in the extreme southeastern portion of the Territory, contain the entire Mormon strength. In the counties of Owyhee, Ada, Washington, Boisé, Lemhi, Alturas, and Custer the Mormons have no power whatever.

At the last census, in 1880, Idaho Territory had a population of 32,713; of these North Idaho had 6,983 and South Idaho 25,730. At that time the Mormon population in Idaho did not exceed 7,000. Since then there has been no great increase of Mormons within the Territory, but the discovery of gold in the Wood River country in Alturas and Custer Counties has brought into the Territory, according to the most reliable estimates, not less than 20,000 people. Of this increase nearly all are anti-Mormon. In South Idaho, then, at this time, the relative population of what is known as Mormon and Gentile is 7,000 of the former and 38,682 Gentile, or in the ratio less than 1 to 5 in favor of the anti-Mormon influence.

Eighth. It has been claimed, as we are informed, that the annexation of North Idaho to the State of Washington would make the latter unshapely. An eminent statesman of our country, speaking of the boundaries of the States forming our Union, has said that the boundaries of the States should be such as God and nature have established. We presume that boundaries not conforming to this principle are not desirable. The boundaries of Idaho, as to all north of the Salmon River Mountains, are contrary to this principle and naturally sever us from Washington and unite us to Idaho. The truth is that the present awkward shape of Idaho and the consequent unfortunate condition of our section is the result of political intrigue of aspirants for office. Its present boundaries, as far as North Idaho is concerned, were established without the knowledge and against the wishes of the people directly interested, and since their establishment our efforts to restore our section of the territory to its former place have been constantly adhered to. We believe that all such political aspirations have been gratified, and that no citizen, either public or private, will be injured by the desired change.

Were the present eastern boundary of Washington Territory at the crest of the Bitter Root Mountains, including North Idaho, and southward to the crest of the Salmon River Range as a southern boundary, the natural boundaries would be restored and the entire Columbia River basin would be included within the State of Washington. This would leave the Territory of Idaho of a nearly rectangular shape, with all sections easily accessible from its center and with an area of 55,000 square miles, larger in extent than the State of Alabama, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maine, Mississippi, New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, North Carolina, Virginia, or Wisconsin, while the State of Washington would have an area of 90,000 square miles, smaller than the Territory of Arizona, Dakota, Montana, New Mexico, Wyoming, or the State of California, Colorado, Nevada, Texas, or Oregon.

Adversely to annexation, no reference is made by the committee to the people of North Idaho. Their condition is entirely ignored. It is this unfortunate disregard of all our rights and claims that has reduced us to a condition of political vassalage. We earnestly appeal to the honorable members of Congress to do us the justice to carefully examine our grievances. We feel it to be our duty to say that we are now, and for years have been, most unjustly misrepresented in Congress. We can only look for relief to members of other States and Territories. There is now a Territorial debt, a part of which we are under obligations to pay, of about $60,000. This is not payable until 1885 or most of it would have been paid at this time. We are ready to assume our proportion of this debt, and if indeed our "ransom can only be bought with a price," we will, if required, pay any proportion thereof that Congress may impose upon us. We most respectfully ask that our wishes may not be ignored. We were originally a part of Washington Territory; we were unjustly severed from it, and we can only be restored to political and commercial prosperity by being annexed to and becoming a part of the State of Washington.

In February, 1886, having received what purported to be the proceedings of a meeting held by the people of the Cœur d'Alene mining region protesting against annexation, I communicated with the Delegate from Idaho Territory to learn to what extent, in his judgment, the proceedings of that meeting represented the people of the Territory, and in reply to my inquiry I received the following:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., February 24, 1886.

DEAR SIR: Referring to our recent conversation touching the sentiment of the people of North Idaho on the proposition to annex that portion of Idaho to Washington Territory, we have to say that in our judgment the great majority earnestly desire the enactment of such a law.

The suggestion, which comes from the Cœur d'Alene mining region, to annex that portion of North Idaho which lies north of the forty-seventh parallel to Montana voices the desire of a very inconsiderable portion of the community. This suggestion comes from a small portion of a mining population which, as is well known, is migratory and unsettled. It may embrace possibly from two hundred to five hundred people. From no other quarter has any intimation of such a desire reached us.

There can be no doubt as to the propriety of the annexation of that part of Idaho Territory lying north of the Salmon River range of mountains to the Territory of Washington. Every interest of the inhabitants thereof will be properly subserved by such annexation.

We have the honor to be, your obedient servants,

C. S. VOORHEES,
JOHN HAILEY.

Hon. J. N. DOLPH,
United States Senate.

If it be true that there has been any considerable change in public sentiment in North Idaho recently on the question of annexation, the submission of the question to the people as provided for in this bill will give them an opportunity to express their desires in the matter.

The Senator from South Carolina, in his speech of the 10th of April upon the bill for the admission of Dakota, said:

I do not differ with the honorable Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] in much that he said yesterday in regard to that Territory. I do not take issue with him when he states that it has a population sufficient for statehood, that it has soil of sufficient productive capacity and resources to maintain a dense population. I do not take issue with him when he says that the condition of statehood is preferable to a Territorial condition. But, sir, when he goes a step further and claims, in effect at least, that the people of that Territory have an inherent right to be admitted into this Union as a State because of this condition of things, I can not agree with him.

As I understand the rule on that subject, it is entirely and solely within the discretion of Congress whether any Territorial community, any geographical area of this country, shall be admitted into the sisterhood of States.

Whether the right of the people of a Territory to admission into the Union can be called an inherent right or not, under our Constitution and theory of government the people of a Territory possessing a suitable area, with sufficient population to entitle them to representation, with sufficient resources to maintain a State government and institutions not repugnant to our form of government, have a moral right to admission, and it is the duty of Congress to admit them. Congress has no right to refuse their application except in the sense in which right is synonymous with legal power. Congress has the power, the majority of either House has the power to refuse to admit a State. It may exercise this power in its discretion, and however grossly it may abuse it there is no way in which it can be compelled to perform its duty. The same thing is true, however, in regard to the exercise of any other power conferred upon Congress which involves a corresponding duty. The exercise of its power to pass appropriation bills is as much in its discretion as the exercise of its power to admit a new State into the Union. In the case of Washington Territory I believe there is a legal right to admission, but it is a right without a remedy.

I have already alluded to the compact made between the States acting through Congress and the people of the original Oregon Territory in the organic act of that Territory.

The provision made in the fifth article of the compact contained in the ordinance of 1787 for the government of the Territory Northwest of the Ohio River, for the division of the Territory into States, and their admission into the Union, which was as follows, "Whenever any of said States have 60,000 free inhabitants therein, such States shall be admitted into the Congress of the United States on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever, and shall be at liberty to form a permanent constitution and State government," was adopted and made a part of the organic act of Oregon Territory, and thus became a compact between the States and the people of the Territory. In a speech in the Senate March 31 and April 1, 1886, upon the bill to admit the State of Washington into the Union, I said:

In the act of Congress of May 26, 1790, providing a Territorial government for the territory south of the Ohio River, it was declared that the inhabitants of that territory should "enjoy all the privileges set forth in the ordinance of the late Congress for the government of the territory northwest of the Ohio."

The debates in Congress upon the admission of Tennessee into the Union show that this clause was understood to be a compact with the people of that Territory; that a Territory of suitable dimensions, when it possessed 60,000 free inhabitants, should be admitted into the Union as a State. The organic act of Oregon Territory contained a similar clause guarantying to the people of that Territory the rights, privileges, and advantages granted and secured to the people of the territory northwest of the Ohio by the ordinance of 1787. This was claimed by some of the ablest statesmen in Congress, in the debate upon the bill for the admission of Oregon, to be a compact with the people of the Territory that when the Territory possessed 60,000 free inhabitants it should be entitled to admission as a State. If this was true in the case of Oregon, it needs no argument to show that it is equally so in the case of Washington. I shall only state this question and leave it. It is not so important at this time as it would have been at an earlier day. Washington now has not only 60,000 free inhabitants but three times that number, a population large enough to entitle her to admission under any rule that has ever been invoked as to population.

Of course, if the Territory was entitled under that compact to admission when it had a population of 60,000, it presents all the stronger case with three times that number. Here is a solemn agreement of this great Government made with its own citizens. It included all who were within original Oregon at the date of the organization of the Territory, and all who should afterward become resident citizens of the Territory. It stipulated for the admission of States of suitable dimensions to be carved out of the Territory when the population reached the number provided in the ordinance of 1787. Will we keep the stipulation? During the discussion of that bill in the House of Representatives Hon. Alexander H. Stephens made a speech, from which I quote. He said:

"I have this to say to the House, and especially to those who have any doubt about the population of Oregon, that for myself I hold that there can be no question but that there is sufficient population there to require us, under existing laws and compacts, to admit that Territory as a State into the Union. There must be at least 60,000 people there, and my own opinion is that there are at least 100,000 thousand.

"In the bill organizing the Territory of Oregon, which was passed in 1848, I find the following clause:

"'SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That the inhabitants of said Territory shall be entitled to enjoy all and singular the rights, privileges, and advantages granted and secured to the people of the Territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio by the articles of compact contained in the ordinance for the government of said Territory, on the 13th day of July, 1787; and shall be subject to all the conditions and restrictions and prohibitions in said articles of compact imposed upon the people of said Territory.' (Statutes at Large, volume 9, page 329.)

"This, sir, was a guaranty given in 1848, after the settlement of the controversy with England as to that Territory. Now I call the attention of the House to the ninth article of the ordinance of 1787:

"'And whenever any of the said States shall have 60,000 free inhabitants therein, such State shall be admitted, by its Delegates, into the Congress of the United States, on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever; and shall be at liberty to form a permanent constitution and State government: Provided, The constitution and government so to be formed shall be republican, and in conformity to the principles contained in these articles; and, so far as it can be consistent with the general interest of the confederacy, such admission shall be allowed at an earlier period and when there may be a less number of free inhabitants in the State than 60,000.'

"If there were any question as to whether there were 90,000 people there, if there were any question as to whether Oregon comes up to the ratio of representation, yet, sir, I hold that there is a solemn guaranty and a compact made with those people which we ought not to disregard."

If this view of the organic law of the Territory is correct, as I think it is, these people who, in the face of great obstacles, hardships, and privations, have laid the foundations of a rich and powerful commonwealth do not come here as suppliants for favors at the hands of Congress. On the contrary, they demand that which of right is theirs, and to further deprive them of which will be a gross violation of a solemn compact—a compact under the provisions of which it has been held, and by some of the ablest and greatest men this country has produced, and whose counsel even now is worthy the consideration of those who seek to control and direct the destinies of the nation—it was held, I say, that a Territory to the people of which the guaranties of this compact had been extended became entitled to admission as a State ipso facto the moment its population amounted to 60,000.

The trouble is not that the people of Washington Territory have not a right to admission as a State of the Union, but that they have no remedy for the wrong which Congress commits by refusing their application for statehood.

The Senator from South Carolina in his speech said:

It is the imperialism of a concentrated, consolidated national power, if it should ever come—and God forbid—which will threaten and destroy the liberties of the people.

Sir, in the refusal to admit the Territories when they have sufficient population and sufficient resources to support State governments and institutions republican in form and not repugnant to our theory of government, there is, if not a usurpation of Federal power, a gross abuse of it and a palpable subversion of the liberties of the people.

The right of the United States to acquire, hold, and organize territory can not be referred to any clause or provision of the Federal Constitution, but depends upon its inherent power of sovereignty. This power can not, consistently with our system of State and National Government, be extended into a right to continue the newly-acquired territory under Territorial government after they are prepared for self-governing commonwealths and for their incorporation into the Federal system.

The plenary power which the General Government has and exercises to legislate for the Territories is necessary while their population is sparse and their resources insufficient to maintain a State government; and the Territorial governments are instituted for the double purpose of providing an organized society and good government for the people during the period which must elapse before they are prepared for statehood and of developing them into commonwealths capable of self-government and prepared for membership in the Federal Union. But when this period arrives, when a Territory has become fitted to assume the relations of a State to the Federal Union and share in the government, to longer keep it in the condition of a Territory is undemocratic, contrary to the spirit of our institutions, and is a bold and most dangerous assertion and exercise of national power.

In the manner provided by the Constitution nineteen Territories have been admitted as States. All these nineteen Territories were admitted with less population and resources than South Dakota and Washington have to-day. The power to keep these Territories which, so far as the right of self-government and their relation to the Federal Government are concerned, are States in embryo, but so far as territory, population, and resources are concerned, full-grown States, out of the Union rests with a majority of either branch of Congress. But it will be longer exercised as to Dakota and Washington in violation of the faith which has been pledged to the people of those Territories by a solemn compact and by the uniform course of Congress in dealing with the Territories, and will be a crime against republican institutions.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I simply wish to call the attention of the Senate to that provision of the substitute which proposes to submit to the people of the portion of Idaho that is proposed to be cut off and annexed to Washington Territory the question whether that legislation shall take effect or not. It is section 2, which provides:

That if the electors of that part of the Territory of Idaho embraced within the boundaries hereinafter first described shall, by a majority vote, as hereinafter provided, decide in favor of including such part of Idaho Territory in the State of Washington, then, and in that event, said State shall consist of the Territory embraced within the following boundaries, to wit:

There has been a vast amount of adjudication upon this question, turning upon the distinction between legislation which takes effect upon the happening of a certain event and the legislation which derives its vigor and existence from a tribunal other than the legislative department of the Government. The argument pro and con applies as well to the Congress of the United States as the Legislature of any State, because the principles involved are the same.

The Constitution of the United States vests the legislative power in the Congress. Congress has no more right to delegate that power to a popular election than has the Legislature of a State to delegate that power. Every act of Congress is proprio vigore, by reason of our votes, in existence. No law of the United States can be enacted or repealed except by an act of Congress.

The whole difficulty in the question arises from the subtlety and refinement of argument which has been indulged in by eminent lawyers and judges upon the distinction between legislation going into effect upon the happening of a future event and the question whether an act is in existence from the beginning or not. Here is a proposition in this bill which says that if in the event of a popular election the people of a Territory at that election shall decide in favor of becoming an integral portion of another Territory, then the law of Congress takes effect, but unless that vote eventuates in that way, then the law does not take effect.

Now, where is the law-making power? I know that judges in different States of the Union have decided this question pro and con upon the one side and the other. They have in my own State upon the local-option question decided that the people had a right in the different localities to vote as to whether an act of the Legislature should obtain in that locality and county or not. With very great respect to the judges who made that decision, or a majority of them, I do not think that the sentiment of the profession in the State sustains it. In my judgment, the weight of authority is unquestionably against this delegation of legislative power, for it is nothing else. Mr. Cooley in his work on Constitutional Limitations summarizes the whole matter in a very few sentences.

Mr. STEWART. Before the Senator proceeds to read from Mr. Cooley, I should like to know the difference in principle between that and an enabling act which allows the people of a Territory to form a State government and to be admitted if they will do certain acts.

Mr. VEST. There is a very great difference.

Mr. STEWART. I can not see it.

Mr. VEST. There is a very great difference. An enabling act is simply saying to the people of a Territory, "You can go on and form a constitution and submit it in proper republican form to the Congress of the United States, and if we choose we can then admit you with that constitution or we can reject you." But here is an act which says that if the people vote a certain way the law takes effect; if the people do not vote a certain way it does not take effect.

Mr. STEWART. Is not that the precise question in an enabling act which allows the people of a Territory to be admitted on a proclamation of the President if they do a certain act?

Mr. VEST. I think not. I think the enabling act is simply where Congress says, "If you do so and so, and conform to our will in the matter, not your own, we will decide in advance that if you do certain things then certain other things shall happen." That is the distinction. But when, I submit, did any lawyer who has any respect for himself or his profession say that the Congress of the United States could pass an act providing that the people of Missouri or of Nevada should vote whether an act of Congress was to take effect or not?

Mr. BLAIR. Is that this case?

Mr. VEST. That is this case.

Mr. BLAIR. Do they vote whether the act of Congress shall take effect?

Mr. VEST. Most unquestionably, or else the English language loses its meaning. In the event that the people of that Territory say that the law shall take effect it is a law; if they vote the other way it is not a law.

Mr. BLAIR. What would be the question submitted to the people? Would it not be simply whether they desired annexation to Washington Territory? Would not that be all that would be submitted to the people?

Mr. VEST. It makes no difference what the question is.

Mr. BLAIR. Certainly it makes a difference, because the other instance would be perhaps an act of legislation. All that is submitted is simply whether they will be annexed to the Territory of Washington to form a State, and they are to vote on that question. The Senator may be right, but it seems to me that it is not such legislation as he argues it to be.

Mr. VEST. The power is vested in the Congress of the United States to fix the boundaries of the Territories and to admit new States into the Union with certain boundaries. That is a question for us to determine. It is not a question for the people specifically of that Territory, but for the people of all the States and of all the other Territories. The Constitution vests that power in Congress. Have we the right to delegate that power to any locality, to any Territory? That is the only question, and I propose without further argument to read what Mr. Cooley summarizes. You may find authorities upon both sides of the question, but if you turn to Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, page 145, you will find the question exhaustively considered and the authorities cited. First he refers to the local question of taxation in townships, school laws, local option laws, and then he says, giving the decisions in the different States:

If the decision of the question is to depend upon the weight of judicial authority up to the present time, it must be held that there is no power to refer the adoption or rejection of a general law to the people of the State any more than there is to refer it to any other authority. The prevailing doctrine in the courts appears to be that, except in those cases where, by the Constitution, the people have expressly reserved to themselves a power of decision, the function of legislation can not be exercised by them, even to the extent of accepting or rejecting a law which has been framed for their consideration. The exercise of this power by the people in other cases is not expressly and in terms prohibited by the Constitution, but it is forbidden by necessary and unavoidable implication. The senate and assembly are the only bodies of men clothed with the power of general legislation. They possess the entire power, with the exception above stated.

The people reserved no part of it to themselves (with that exception), and can therefore exercise it in no other case. It is therefore held that the Legislature have no power to submit a proposed law to the people, nor have the people power to bind each other by acting upon it. They voluntarily surrendered that power when they adopted the Constitution.

* * * * * * *

Nor, it seems, can such legislation be sustained as legislation of a conditional character whose force is to depend upon the happening of some future event, or upon some future change of circumstances, etc.

The argument in this case is that this act is to take effect upon the happening of a future event, and that event is a popular election; but it is unquestionably true in this case that the law derives its vitality from that election. In other words, Congress, instead of saying that this portion of Idaho shall be cut off and annexed to Washington, says, "We will not exercise our legislative discretion, but we leave it to the people of that specific part of Idaho Territory to say whether they will be joined to Washington or not." That is exactly what the Constitution of the United States meant to prohibit. If Congress could delegate that legislative discretion to the people of that part of Idaho, then we can delegate our discretion as to any subject to the people of any portion of the United States, and that can not be done.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator from Missouri permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. Is it not customary in the States to submit to a vote of the people of a county the question as to the location of the county seat or the change of the county seat?

Mr. VEST. I admit that that has been done.

Mr. SPOONER. It is done in nearly every State in the Union.

Mr. VEST. I admit it has been done. Mr. Cooley summarizes all these cases.

Mr. SPOONER. Is not that a delegation of legislative power in some sense?

Mr. VEST. To a certain extent it is, and the courts have decided pro and con upon that very question. Unquestionably that is so. The weight of authority, however, as Mr. Cooley says, is against it. I refer Senators who feel an interest in the matter to a very learned decision made by the supreme court of Delaware, found in 4th Delaware (Harrington's) Reports, in which the court considers this question and all the authorities, and summarizes the whole thing by stating that—

The legislative, executive and judicial powers compose the sovereign power of a State. The people of the State of Delaware have vested the legislative power in a general assembly, consisting of a senate and house of representatives; the supreme executive powers of the State in a governor; and the judicial power in the several courts mentioned in the sixth article. The sovereign power therefore, of this State, resides with the legislative, executive, and judicial departments. Having thus transferred the sovereign power, the people can not resume or exercise any portion of it.

I know that there has been a vast amount of very learned argument upon both sides of this question. My own opinion as a lawyer, and I give it for what it is worth, is against any legislation. We had it in the Dakota bill, and I opposed it then. When I was a member of the Committee on Territories I opposed it in every conceivable instance. If it is right that this part of Idaho Territory shall be cut off and annexed to Washington, we ought to do it; but we ought not to leave it to the people there to decide, and let all the caprices of a popular election and all the prejudices come in instead of the calm, deliberate judgment of the Congress of the United States.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I think a fair reading of Judge Cooley will make a very clear case against the proposition of the Senator from Missouri, with all due respect. Going back a little further, Judge Cooley says, before coming to the part which the Senator from Missouri read:

But it is not always essential that a legislative act should be a completed statute which must in any event take effect as law at the time it leaves the hands of the legislative department. A statute may be conditional, and its taking effect may be made to depend upon some subsequent event. Affirmative legislation may in some cases be adopted, of which the parties interested are at liberty to avail themselves or not at their option.

That is the kind of a case this is. Judge Cooley proceeds:

"In these cases the legislative act is regarded as complete when it has passed through the constitutional formalities necessary to perfected legislation, notwithstanding its actually going into operation as law may depend upon its subsequent acceptance. We have elsewhere spoken of municipal corporations, and of the powers of legislation which may be and commonly are bestowed upon them, and the bestowal of which is not to be considered as trenching upon the maxim that legislative power is not to be delegated, since that maxim is to be understood in the light of the immemorial practice of this country and of England, which has always recognized the propriety of vesting in the municipal organizations certain powers of local regulation, in respect to which the parties immediately interested may fairly be supposed more competent to judge of their needs than any central authority. As municipal organizations are mere auxiliaries of the State government in the important business of municipal rule, the Legislature may create them at will from its own views of propriety or necessity, and without consulting the parties interested; and it also possesses the like power to abolish them, without stopping to inquire what may be the desire of the corporators on that subject.

"Nevertheless, as the incorporators have a special and peculiar interest in the terms and conditions of the charter, in the powers conferred, and liabilities imposed, as well as in the general question whether they shall originally be or afterwards remain incorporated at all or not, and as the burdens of municipal government must rest upon their shoulders, and especially as by becoming incorporated they are held in law to undertake to discharge the duties the charter imposes, it seems eminently proper that their voice should be heard on the question of their incorporation, and that their decision should be conclusive, unless for strong reasons of State policy or local necessity it should seem important for the State to overrule the opinion of the local majority. The right to refer any legislation of this character to the people peculiarly interested does not seem to be questioned, and the reference is by no means unusual.

For the like reasons the question whether a county or township shall be divided and a new one formed, or two townships or school districts formerly one be reunited, or a city charter be revised, or a county seat located at a particular place, or after its location removed elsewhere, or the municipality contract particular debts, or engage in a particular improvement, is always a question which may with propriety be referred to the voters of the municipality for decision.

The part read by the Senator from Missouri from Judge Cooley related to general laws—whether a general law, such as a criminal law, should have such an effect. That was trenching upon another matter; but here is a question whether these parties will become a part of the State of Washington. They are the parties interested. It is one of the natural things to submit to them; it is legitimately submitted to them; and it is not different from the whole tenor of the bill.

This bill, as the bill which was passed for the admission of Nevada and many other States, provides that the people shall vote to adopt a constitution and to fix certain boundaries, and if they consent to that, it shall become a law on the proclamation of the President finding those facts. That is the condition of this bill. We are reporting such provisions constantly in every bill which can properly be termed an enabling act, and which provides for the admission of a State. The enabling act itself never goes into effect until the people say so. The whole question whether it will become a State is a question depending upon the vote of the people, and to say that we can not submit the question of boundaries to the people of the Territory or of any locality in the Territory is not the ordinary thing to do. It seems to me an entirely new doctrine, never entertained before.

There never was any question but that Congress could make a proposition to be submitted in this way. Every day we are passing bills providing that the law shall go into effect settling an account, paying a man, upon condition that he will surrender his whole claim, it depending upon him to accept it or not. One-third of the legislation of Congress depends upon the acceptance by people of the conditions prescribed in the act. That is all this is. We say to the people of the Panhandle, "If you desire to be a part of this State, if you desire to be annexed, if you desire to come in, and make it manifest by your vote, it shall be done."

It is something for their benefit which they may accept or reject. It is a proposition to them. Here is a proposition to the people of Washington Territory whether they shall be admitted as a State or not. We say to them, "If you accept, you become a State without further legislation." That is provided by this bill, and that is the ordinary legislation. I can not possibly see any distinction. I think that the doctrine of Judge Cooley is clear and distinct, and covers the case exactly, and that there can be nothing in the point made by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate but a few moments. Unfortunately I do not feel like talking at all, and I am desirous to go on with the bill.

There is, I suppose, a pretty general desire on the part of the Senate at least, on both sides of the Chamber, that the Territory of Washington should finally and very soon come into the Union as a State. I apprehend that perhaps there is not any division of opinion upon that question. There is no reason that I know of why it should not come in at as early a date as the Congress of the United States can provide for it. It has the necessary population. It is admitted, I think, by all to have about 165,000 people, irrespective of the annexation of any portion of any other Territory to it. It has all the resources and characteristics that belong to a Territory which would justify the Congress of the United States in making it a State at as early a date as we can pass the bill. I think myself that it ought to have been done before now.

So there is no question involved in this controversy as to the admission of Washington Territory. The only question, I apprehend, is the question whether we will annex a portion of Idaho Territory to it as one of the conditions of admission. My position is that that should not be done. The only difference between the two measures before the Senate, with some little amendments in the substitute which I offered, is that the bill of the Senator from Nevada is so framed as to take in four counties in the north part of Idaho, depending upon a popular vote of the people of those four counties, and no other portion of the Territory. The amendment which I introduced as a substitute for it proposes simply to admit Washington Territory, pure and simple, as we find its territorial lines or boundaries, as it was created into a Territory by the Congress of the United States.

It seems to me that the Congress of the United States is doing an act of injustice to the people of Idaho and doing wrong with reference to itself in segregating, if you please—although the Senator from Nevada objects to that word—any portion of Idaho Territory and annexing it to the Territory of Washington. I know of no reason for it. The Senator, it is true, has said that the trade of the people of those northern counties goes west instead of coming south into the Territory of Idaho. That may be true as it is now, but it is true the same fact might be stated of portions of many of the States of the Union. Take, for instance, the State of Indiana, a portion of the State of Indiana trades in the State of Illinois, or at Chicago, if you please, almost universally, and yet that furnishes no reason why a tier of counties in Indiana that lie nearest to Chicago should be segregated from the State of Indiana and added to the State of Illinois.

Their general community of interest outside of going to the city of Chicago to trade is in their own State. So, taking the people of Idaho, while at present and for years past there has been that difficulty in traveling from one portion of the Territory of Idaho to another, in traveling from the south to the north, or from the north to the south, yet those difficulties are disappearing, and it will be but a very short time before the counties now proposed to be annexed to Washington Territory will be so connected by means of communication and transportation by railroad connections as that their interests will be in common just as they are in other States and Territories of the Union.

So there is nothing in the proposition of the Senator from Nevada as regards the question of difficulty of communication between the two sections of the country.

The Territory of Idaho has about 100,000 people, perhaps a few more than that. The Territory has been going forward, not rapidly, not suddenly springing into a population of 100,000, but by a steady, regular, constant growth, which is the best growth known in this country or any other for any community to enjoy. They have gone on year after year, and year after year, increasing in population and increasing in wealth, increasing in development, and increasing also in their means of communication from one section of the Territory to another.

As a matter of fact nearly all the counties in the Territory of Idaho are cut off by what fifty years ago would have been regarded as insurmountable obstacles to communication, as the Senator from Nevada regards the mountain ranges between the north and south portions of the Territory of Idaho; but time, and industry, and enterprise, and a little money have connected all those counties in the southern portion below the range of mountains referred to, so that there is nothing involved now in the question of communication from one county to another, or from any of those counties to the metropolis of the Territory, Boisé City.

There is another fact which I desire to suggest. I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that there is not anybody, so far as officials are concerned, in the Territory who is demanding a segregation of those counties and their annexation to the Territory of Washington. I say that there is nobody here appealing to the Congress of the United States, who in any way represents the Territory of Idaho, asking for the division of Idaho Territory, or the annexation of those four counties to the Territory of Washington.

Mr. STEWART. Did not those four counties vote to annex themselves to Washington at the last election?

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator from Nevada is talking about ancient history.

Mr. STEWART. Did they not do so at the last election?

Mr. CULLOM. No, sir; they did not do it at the last election. I have evidence here before me of the most recent date, furnished during this year of our Lord 1888, which shows that perhaps every county in the State except the county of Nez Perces, in which the town of Lewiston is located, is protesting against the annexation of these counties to the Territory of Washington or to their being segregated in any way.

Mr. STEWART. Why were they induced to vote for it then?

Mr. CULLOM. I assert that it is an outrage on the rest of the Territory to say that we will leave it to one portion of the Territory of Idaho to say whether they will go off or not, and not allow the people of the Territory generally to give expression to what they think about it irrespective of what a portion of the Territory may wish to do in the premises.

Allow me to show what the exact facts are in regard to it. January 11 of the present year a protest of the governor, chief-justice, United States marshal, attorney-general, and all Federal Territorial officers of Idaho was filed here against any division of Idaho Territory. January 16, a protest of two hundred and fifty citizens of Cassia County was filed against any division. January 23, a protest of two hundred and fifty citizens of Idaho County was filed. I believe that is one of the proposed counties that is to be taken off.

January 23, a protest of the board of trade, Hailey County, was filed. January 23, there was a protest of the board of county commissioners of Cassia County. January 27, there was a protest of county commissioners of Boisé County. January 27, there was a protest of fifty citizens of Kootenai County. That is another one of the counties that is proposed to be annexed to Washington Territory. February 6, there was a protest of the county commissioners of Idaho County. That is one of the counties referred to as being in the portion of the Territory which is sought to be annexed to Washington Territory. February 6, there was a protest of the Democratic central committee of the Territory of Idaho. I have the protest here. It is as follows:

A protest from Idaho against dismemberment.—Proceedings of special meeting of the Democratic Territorial central committee of Idaho.

BOISÉ CITY, IDAHO TERRITORY, January 26, 1888.

At a special meeting of the Democratic Territorial central committee, held at the Territorial capitol building, the following proceedings were had, namely:

"Whereas Idaho Territory, upon the advent of railroads and the consequent development, has entered upon a career of advancement and prosperity hitherto almost unparalleled in the history of Western States and Territories, and which is rapidly developing her great natural resources, and will, if undisturbed by dismemberment or other adverse legislation, soon fit her in wealth and population to take the proud position of a sovereign State of the American Union; and

"Whereas with better means of inter-communication all parts of the Territory are fast becoming homogeneous and united in interests, industries, and aspirations, while the interests of the people of Northern Idaho and of Washington Territory are diverse and dissimilar in every respect—

The Senator from Nevada states that all the interests of the people of Northern Idaho are connected and identified with the interests of Washington Territory, while these resolutions assert exactly the opposite—

Washington Territory being an agricultural region while Northern Idaho is principally a mining country; and

"Whereas Washington is now a Territory of vast geographical extent, and the proposed annexation of Northern Idaho would increase its area to within a fraction of 90,000 square miles, and make it greater in extent by 9,000 square miles than the combined States of Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Rhode Island, New Jersey, Delaware and Maryland; and

"Whereas but a small portion of the people of North Idaho, and these principally residents of one county; and—

I will stop here long enough to say that the trouble which has been brought upon the Territory of Idaho has been brought upon the Territory substantially by the people of this county referred to, because at one time it was the capital of the Territory, and since that time it has lost its position as the capital, and it has been dissatisfied ever since—

"Whereas but a small portion of the people of North Idaho—and these principally residents of one county—favor annexation to Washington Territory, while the people of all other portions of the Territory are almost unanimously opposed to any scheme of segregation, therefore the Democratic territorial central committee, assembled at the capital, and representing the Democratic party of the Territory, do unanimously

"Resolve, First, that the Democratic party of Idaho, in the exercise as in duty bound of the utmost solicitude for the welfare of the people of the whole Territory, is unalterably opposed to any division whatever of the Territory, and does solemnly protest against all measures and schemes looking towards the segregation, partition, parceling out, or annihilation of the Territory. And in the name and upon the eternal principles of our party we call upon the Democracy of the Union to save us from the fate of Poland and the crafty schemes of covetous neighbors and designing politicians."

That was passed by the central committee of the Democratic party of the Territory of Idaho.

Mr. MANDERSON. I ask the Senator from Illinois whether it is not the fact that the members of that committee from these four counties were present at that meeting?

Mr. CULLOM. I think that is true, but this paper does not disclose the fact. I have in my hand a dispatch from the Republican committee and members of the Territorial convention. It is as follows:

BOISÉ CITY, IDAHO, May 3, 1888.

To Senator SHELBY M. CULLOM, Washington, D. C.:

The following was passed by the Republican convention here to-day:

"Resolved, That the Republican party of Idaho in convention assembled Declares itself to be unalterably opposed to any division of the Territory of Idaho.

"Resolved, That we call upon the Congress of the United States to defeat the bill of Senator STEWART, of Nevada, relating to the division of Idaho Territory, as it is unfair and unjust to the people of the Territory and is in conflict with the wishes of the people, and that he has never been called upon by any authorized body of citizens to express the wishes of the people of Idaho.

"Resolved, That we indorse without qualification the position which our Delegate in Congress has so firmly taken to preserve and protect our Territory from spoliation."

H. M. BENNETT,

Chairman Territorial Republican Committee, and members of convention.

Mr. STEWART. Is the Senator aware that a delegate from Northern Idaho was excluded so as to make that unanimous?

Mr. CULLOM. No, sir; I am not aware that any such fact existed. I have no information upon that subject.

Mr. STEWART. I have.

Mr. CULLOM. I have here the proceedings of the board of county commissioners of Boisé County, as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

The board of county commissioners of Boise County, Territory of Idaho, would respectfully represent to your honorable body—

First. That the citizens of our county are unanimously opposed to the segregation of any portion of the Territory of Idaho.

Second. That we deem it unfair to the remaining portion of the Territory to submit to a vote of certain counties whether or not they will go to some other State or Territory.

Third. We would respectfully represent that there are thousands of people in the Territory of Idaho who have been here since its organization, more than twenty-five years ago; that they have endured the hardships and privations incident to the settlement of a new State; that they have had pride in developing the resources of the Territory and in building up a code of laws such as the experience of years has demonstrated to be specially adapted to the needs of the country; that these laws have been recently amended and codified at great expense; that during a quarter of a century these old settlers have looked with pride upon our gradual and sure growth and increase in population, relying during all this time upon the good faith of the United States (implied if not formally pledged) that when her population should warrant, the "Gem of the Mountains" would be admitted to the sisterhood of sovereign States as the State of Idaho.

We think if segregation in any form and to any extent is to be submitted to a vote, it should be to a vote of the whole Territory.

We are contented to be let alone.

We have unshaken confidence in the ultimate outcome of Idaho if she can be left as she is.

The Territory is not unduly large, and yet is of sufficient size to make a respectable State.

We ask only to be permited to rise or fall, to survive or perish with an intact Idaho.

The Senator from Nevada refers to the fact that a bill annexing these four counties has already passed the Senate. That is true, and I believe it is also true that I voted for it, but the situation of affairs in that Territory has materially changed within a very brief period of time. It is true that for a good while there did not seem to be in the minds of the people of the northern portion of the Territory of Idaho a very great certainty that they were going to be able to get communication such as they desired between their portion of the Territory and the central portion, especially the capital; but it has been ascertained within a year that there will be no difficulty whatever in building railroads so as to connect the two portions of the Territory as I have indicated. The Territory is already appealing to the Congress of the United States for the passage of a law allowing it to spend money for the purpose of building wagon-roads over the mountains between the two sections. It is true, as I shall show directly, that there are letters and maps here from railroad men indicating that a railroad can be built without any difficulty betwen the two sections of the Territory.

But I was going to refer to the fact that we passed a bill a year or two ago, I have forgotten just when, admitting the Territory of Washington with these counties annexed. The bill, it will be remembered, was vetoed by the President.

Mr. MANDERSON. Let me correct the Senator. That was not the bill vetoed. It was simply a bill annexing these four counties of the Territory of Idaho to the Territory of Washington, which was a very different proposition.

Mr. CULLOM. I was thinking that it was the bill admitting Washington that was vetoed.

Mr. PLATT. May I make an explanation?

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT. In the bill which provided for the admission of the State of Washington we did include substantially that part of Northern Idaho which the Senator from Nevada now proposes to include in the pending bill. That bill was not acted on in the other House. Then we passed a bill attaching this portion of Idaho to Washington Territory, and that bill was not signed by the President. It was not vetoed by him, but he received it within less than ten days before the final adjournment of Congress and did not act upon it.

Mr. CULLOM. He exercised what we call the "pocket veto." The President failed to sign the bill. At first I thought it was a bill for admitting Washington Territory with these counties annexed that was vetoed, but I stand corrected upon that point. I remember now that it was simply a bill proposing the annexation of these four counties, or this portion of the Territory of Idaho, to Washington Territory, which was passed and went to the President, as the Senator says, too late for him to examine it. At any rate he failed to sign the bill, and I have in my hand a vote of thanks tendered to President Cleveland by the board of commissioners of Idaho County, which is one of the counties now proposed to be annexed, for his action in vetoing the segregation bill passed by the last Congress, and I will read it. It is as follows:

VOTE OF THANKS TENDERED TO PRESIDENT CLEVELAND BY THE BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS OF IDAHO COUNTY, IDAHO TERRITORY, FOR HIS ACTION IN VETOING THE SEGREGATION BILL PASSED BY THE LAST SESSION OF CONGRESS.

On the 13th day of April, 1887, the honorable board of county commissioners met in regular session at Mount Idaho and passed the following vote of thanks to President Cleveland for his action in vetoing the bill which passed the last Congress annexing the four northern counties of Idaho Territory to Washington Territory. Present: James Witt, chairman; Phil Cleary, Henry S. Jones, commissioners; T. J. Rhoads, clerk.

Whereas if the bill which recently passed Congress annexing the northern counties of Idaho to Washington Territory had become a law Idaho County would have been dismembered and rendered almost hopelessly bankrupt:

It is ordered, That the thanks of this board be respectfully tendered to His Excellency, President Cleveland, for vetoing the said bill, and also to Governor E. A. Stevenson for his prompt action in the matter.

By order of the board of county commissioners of Idaho County, Idaho Territory.

JAS. WITT, Chairman,
PHIL. CLEARY,
HENRY S. JONES.

MOUNT IDAHO, IDAHO, April 13, 1887.

I also have in my hand a protest from the commissioners of Kootenai County, which is also one of the counties proposed to be annexed to Washington Territory. It is as follows:

Protest against annexation from the county commissioners of Kootenai County, Idaho, recently adopted, protesting against any division of Idaho or annexation of any portion of the Territory to any other State or Territory.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

We, the board of commissioners of Kootenai County, Idaho Territory, in session assembled, January 3, 1888, most respectfully and earnestly protest against any legislation by your honorable bodies that would divide the Territory of Idaho, or set off any portion thereof to any State or Territory. We would respectfully call your attention to the report of his excellency E. A. Stevenson, governor of this Territory, showing the rapid growth of the Territory in wealth and population. Any legislation looking to the segregation of the Territory at this time will, in our opinion, greatly retard our future development.

JOHN RUSSELL, Chairman.
JOHN FERNAN.
LOUIS LEE.

[SEAL OF KOOTENAI COUNTY.]

I have in my hand a protest from the board of commissioners of Idaho County, which I believe I have not read. It is as follows:

ANTI-ANNEXATION.

Protest from the board of county commissioners of Idaho County, Idaho Territory, against annexation.

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

We, the board of county commissioners of Idaho County, Idaho Territory, in regular session assembled, do hereby most earnestly and respectfully protest against the proposed annexation of the northern counties of Idaho Territory to Washington Territory or against any division of Idaho Territory whatsoever.

We would most respectfully represent that the sentiment formerly existing in this county in favor of annexation to Washington Territory has been largely changed since 1882 by the construction of railroads through the unsettled portions of Idaho Territory, and by the increase of material prosperity and wealth consequent thereon, and that with the construction of other contemplated lines of railroad over the alleged "impassable mountain barriers," for which the surveys have already been made, permanent and easy facility of intercourse between the most extreme and isolated sections of Idaho Territory will be afforded.

We would further represent that our commercial, social, and other relations are not identical with, and that we have no such interests in common with Washington Territory as have been erroneously alleged, nor have any satisfactory reasons been advanced to justify, or benefits proposed, to offset the inconvenience, disquietude, and confusion which would naturally result to our people from their transfer from one political jurisdiction, to whose laws all their business and other relations have become adjusted, to that of another, to whose code they are aliens, and where the experimental feature in legislature predominates.

We therefore respectfully and earnestly petition the Congress of the United States to enact no legislation which would divide Idaho Territory.

JAMES WITT,
Chairman Board County Commissioners Idaho County.
[SEAL IDAHO COUNTY.] T. J. RHOADS, Clerk.

MOUNT IDAHO, I. T., January 11, 1888.

The burden of the honorable Senator's argument or appeal to the Senate of the United States for the passage of his bill annexing these four counties to Washington is based on the proposition that they naturally belong there, and that their trade, their commerce, their communication, social, business, and otherwise, all run to Washington Territory, while one of the counties through its board of officers asserts directly the opposite of that proposition.

The Senator also refers to the action that was taken by the Territory and by the Territorial Delegate, Mr. Hailey, some time ago. We all remember Mr. Hailey as being an honorable gentleman, who was the Delegate from that Territory for a number of years, for more than one term I believe, and who always seemed to desire to represent the real interests of the Territory. It is true, as he admits, that at one time he was in favor of the annexation of these four counties to Washington Territory, but I find in the testimony that was taken before the Committee on Territories the following letter from Mr. Hailey dated January 10, 1888, written at Spring Creek Ranch, Alturas County, Idaho, to the governor of the Territory.

SPRING CREEK RANCH, ALTURAS COUNTY, IDAHO,
January 10, 1888.

DEAR SIR: Herewith I send you some statistics of the area of land in the thirty-two States east of the Missouri River, including Texas; also the number of electoral votes those thirty-two States have.

Also the area of land contained in the six States and eight Territories west of the Missouri River (leaving out Alaska), with the number of electoral votes the West have. The figures I send are substantially correct. You will see by the statement that the six States and eight Territories in the West have a much larger area of land than the thirty-two States East, South, and North have.

You will see that these thirty-two States have 370 electoral votes, while the West have 31. Of course these thirty-two States now have complete control of the election for President and Vice-President, and of both branches of Congress; certainly they have the right to all this now, on account of having so much more population than what the West has. I am fully satisfied that the six Western States and Territories will, in the course of time, have as large a population as the thirty-two States named. Certainly the resources of the West, when developed, are fully as good and as great as of the East.

It is true that when we get as much population in the West as they have in the East, under our present system of apportionment, we will have, or at least be entitled to, as many members in the House of Representatives of Congress as the thirty-two States; but as it now stands they will then have their 64 Senators, and we will only have 28. So when that time comes we, or our posterity, will be short 36 Senators, and also short about the same number of electoral votes. To take a reasonable view of the near future, it looks rather bad for the West at best. But when we hear of attempts being made by Western Senators to divide up and obliterate our Territory (Idaho), thereby destroying our chances for two Senators and one or more members in the near future, I must conclude that they are acting hastily, without having given the matter that consideration that is due before such rash steps should be taken.

There was a time a few years ago when a portion of the people of Idaho wished to be annexed to Washington Territory. Their claims were pressed in political conventions, and both political parties in Idaho indorsed the right of three northern counties in Idaho to be annexed to Washington Territory. These conventions doubtless indorsed this move of the three northern counties for political purposes to get votes, as the northern counties held a balance of political power.

I was elected to the Forty-ninth Congress on a platform that indorsed the annexation of three northern counties of Idaho to Washington. While I did not approve of this division, I felt that it was my duty to try and carry out the provisions of the platform; which I did. On my return home I found that in so doing I had incurred the displeasure of a great many friends; in fact I am fully satisfied now that full nine-tenths or more of the resident citizens of Idaho are opposed to any division of Idaho whatever. They desire to be left as they are. We are in a prosperous condition and will soon have all the requisites for statehood.

Yours, truly,

JOHN HAILEY.

Governor E. A. STEVENSON,
Washington, D. C.

That is the testimony of Mr. Hailey, who had, as most of us had, voted for the annexation of these counties. He states there were three that he was in favor of annexing, but there are four included in the amendment which is proposed and which I believe passed the Senate some time ago at a former session.

I have been giving the opinions of people who are opposed to annexation, who are residents of the portion of Idaho which is proposed to be segregated, and I have given the account of the commissioners, State officers, Government officers, etc., as well as the representatives of the two great parties of the country. Now, I desire to continue a little further.

On February 6 the anti-Mormon central committee of Bingham County filed a protest against the annexation of these counties to Washington Territory; also the county commissioners of Ada County; also 100 citizens of Oneida County; also 200 citizens of Idaho County, which I have before referred to; also the Board of Trade of Boisé City, as well as the board of commissioners of Boisé County; and I think my memoranda somewhere state that, in addition to all those, there have not been less than ten or twelve thousand persons, individual citizens, protesting against the annexation of these four counties to Washington Territory.

So, then, it comes down to this, that all the Territorial, county, and United States officers, with the exception, perhaps, of the county officers of one county, or at the most two counties, have protested against the segregation of this Territory by the annexation of these four counties to the Territory of Washington.

The Senator says he does not propose to do that unless the people of those four counties desire it. Well, sir, even if they did desire it, which I deny, after these people have lived and grown up now for these twenty or twenty-five years, each and all of them working to build up a territory and make it worthy of statehood, so that at some not far distant day they might be permitted to come into the union on an equality with the States already in, I submit that it is unfair to those people to say by an act of Congress that, even upon a vote of a majority of the four counties, we will take a portion of your Territory away, when it can not be denied that everybody in all the other counties in the Territory, men, women, and children, is against the annexation of that portion of the Territory, unless it may be a portion of the Mormons of the Territory, who have been under the control of the Gentiles and very many of them have been sent to the penitentiary by the vigilance and proper action of the authorities of the United States Government in enforcing the laws there. So, then, I do not deem it necessary for me to take up very much more time in talking upon this question.

I might read some other evidence that I have here, and I will read a portion of an article from what is called the Cœur d'Alene Record, published in Kootenai County, one of the counties proposed to be annexed. The editor says in the article:

In case of a vote on the question we believe there would be a considerable majority against annexation in every county except Nez Perces—

Which is the county in which Lewiston, the county seat, is located, and which formerly was the capital of the Territory—and even there—

The editor says—

the division sentiment is much weaker than it was a few months ago. Nez Perces County's interests are entirely agricultural, while those of the other counties are not. Considerations which would have much weight there have very little here, and yet the desire to acquire the Panhandle is so great in Eastern Washington that influences might be brought to bear among the hundreds of newcomers in this county which would reduce the anti-division vote to such a point as to give the annexationists, owing to their strength in Nez Perces County, a small majority in the Panhandle as a whole, though they would be beaten in Shoshone, Kootenai, and Idaho Counties. The last two mentioned are but sparsely settled, and even if the majorities were large in proportion to the population they would be small as compared with the annexation majority in Nez Perces.

This is from an editorial published in the paper from which I have quoted. There is some more perhaps that I ought to read. It continues:

Thus, contrary to the most earnest wishes of more than nine-tenths of her people, might the utter political annihilation of Idaho be accomplished by the votes of a few malcontents in a single county; thus might a conspiracy as unworthy of support as that of Catiline succeed, and imperial Idaho, ruthlessly robbed of all political power and prestige, be as unwarrantably partitioned between Washington and Nevada as Poland was partitioned between Russia and Prussia one hundred years ago.

If the Senate gives to the question the consideration that its importance merits, the Stewart scheme will die the death and Idaho will remain intact, and in a few years demand of Congress as a right the power and dignity of statehood.

This is an editorial from a newspaper published in one of these counties, and I think I have some other items here, if I have not mislaid them. I desire now to read a portion of a letter from the governor of Idaho Territory, dated May 3, addressed to myself:

EXECUTIVE OFFICE, IDAHO, Boisé City, May 3, 1888.

DEAR SIR: I have been watching with great interest the proceedings of the Senate on the Stewart bill, which attaches a part of Idaho to Washington.

It does not seem possible that the Senate of the United States will attempt to obliterate and divide this Territory against the memorial of the Territorial Legislature, and the protests of both political parties, backed by at least nine-tenths of the people of Idaho, and including the Delegate in Congress, the governor, and all the Federal and Territorial officers.

All the people of Idaho ask is that Congress will let us remain as we are, undivided and entire, until in our own good time we come in the full consciousness of the justice and merit of our claim, requesting the admission of Idaho into the sisterhood of States.

Hon. S. M. CULLOM,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The remainder of the letter I believe refers to myself, and I will not read it.

What is the ground, then, for the annexation of this portion of Idaho to the Territory of Washington? It is not because Washington needs it, for Washington Territory as it at present stands, as has been stated, covers an area that equals many of the New England States. It is not because Washington Territory needs it on the score of population, for it already has a population of 165,000 and more. It is not because of its want of capacity to make a great State, for already many men on both sides of the Senate have made eloquent speeches here, which have shown to the country that Washington Territory is perhaps a Territory with greater capacity for development than any other Territory in the Union.

I was glad to hear the honorable Senator from California [Mr. HEARST] talk as he did about the Territory of Idaho. I had heard the same thing before. I had heard the honorable gentleman who now so ably represents that Territory in the House of Representatives [Mr. DUBOIS] talk about the capacities of Idaho, and I had heard others, but I was glad to be strengthened in what I believed to be true, having heard it from these gentlemen, by the declaration of the honorable Senator from California when he said that it was the best Territory in the Union in many respects.

So there is no reason for the annexation of these counties on any account so far as Washington Territory is concerned, unless it may be that the people of Washington Territory, represented by its Delegate in Congress, are anxious to make it a greater State than it would be made with the Territorial limits as they now stand.

I am not going to complain of anybody in any State or Territory for desiring these counties. I think it is a laudable ambition, if you please, for a representative either in this branch or in the other branch of Congress to make his State as great as possible by the acquisition of more territory or by a system of legislation that will develop the Territory's resources as they exist; but I submit whether it is right for us as a Congress of the United States to accommodate anybody else outside, whether in the Territory of Washington or in the State of Nevada, to segregate a portion of one of the Territories to help out and make great some other State or Territory in the Union.

While I say that, I do not deny the proposition that it is within the power of Congress. We have the power to obliterate that Territory if we choose; we have the power to take away four or a dozen of its counties if we choose; and we have the power to keep all these Territories from becoming States in the Union as long as we choose. We have that technical constitutional power. But there is an element of right and wrong in these matters, which the Congress of the United States ought to consider when it has before it such bills as this or the question of the admission of a Territory as a State.

After twenty-five years of continuous effort on the part of the people of Idaho Territory, after they have been enduring the privations that belong to frontier life before railroads were built, and enduring them freely, in the hope that at some time not far off they would arrive at that point in power and population and wealth and development that would entitle them to be admitted into the Union. I say it is not right, just as they are beginning to see the daylight dawn, and they have the right to ask admission into the Union as a State, for Congress to step in and say, "We will take off 20,000 people and 25,000 square miles of land, or about that, and attach you to some other Territory and put you back twenty years longer," after the long, tedious waiting and working and enduring that the people of Idaho Territory have gone through.

I submit, sir, that we have no business to do any such thing. If it was apparent that this Territory of Idaho was a poor, miserable patch of territory that had nothing in it that would enable enterprise and energy to develop it so that at any future time, or within reasonable limits, if you please, it could not arrive at that point of development and population which would entitle it to admission as a State, then we might properly consider, perhaps, whether or not we would dismember it and attach a portion of it to Washington Territory or somewhere else, and give some of it to the little State of Nevada, which my honorable friend so ably represents on this floor, if he wants it, so that he may represent a greater State in the Union.

But so long as it has before it this prospect of constant growth, and at no distant time will be in condition when it will have a right to petition Congress for admission into the Union as a State, I do think we ought to let it alone, and rather give encouragement to those people who have been developing the Territory, opening roads there from one county to another and from one portion of the Territory to another, and making sacrifices that we in the States know nothing about. I say we do wrong by them if we discourage them and put them back just as they are getting almost to the door, and at a time when they are in a condition to knock for admission into the Union with the right to expect admission as a State.

Another word or two and I shall close. There has been a good deal said about the difficulty in getting from the northern portion to the southern portion of the Territory, and vice versa. I hold in my hand a letter written by Thomas L. Kimball, acting general manager of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, and addressed to C. F. Adams, esq., president of the Union Pacific Railway, Boston, Mass., and other correspondence which I will read. Mr. Kimball's letter is as follows:

OMAHA, March 23, 1888.

DEAR SIR: In response to your dispatch of yesterday I am able to send you herewith a brief statement from Chief Engineer Bogue, indorsed by Mr. Blickensderfer, with a map of Idaho, showing tracings in red of practicable lines we have surveyed to connect Northern and Southern Idaho. We have full notes of these surveys, from which a detailed report could be made up, but this would take considerable time.

Hoping inclosures will fully cover your present wants, I am, very truly,

THOS. L. KIMBALL,
Acting General Manager.

C. F. ADAMS, Esq.,
President Union Pacific Railway, Boston, Mass.

OMAHA, NEBR., March 23, 1888.

DEAR SIR: The foregoing having been submitted to me by Mr. Bogue, I fully concur in all he says.

Yours, respectfully,

(Signed) J. BLICKENSDERFER,
Chief Engineer Union Pacific Railway Company.

T. L. KIMBALL, Esq.,
Assistant to General Manager.

OMAHA, NEBR., March 23, 1888.

DEAR SIR: Replying to your question whether there is anything in the topographical features of Idaho that precludes railroad communication between the northern and southern portions of the Territory, I beg to say—

1. The southern portion of Idaho is already connected with the Panhandle of Idaho by the Utah and Northern and Northern Pacific Railways, which form a connected line which leaves the Oregon Short Line at Pocatello and runs north through portions of Idaho and Montana, cutting across the Panhandle of Idaho at Pend d'Oreille Lake.

2. Our surveys show that an excellent railroad route exists from Huntington, the terminus of the Oregon Short Line, down Snake River to Lewiston, at the mouth of Clear Water River; and that thence the country tributary to Clear Water River may be reached by railroad up the Clear Water and one of its forks in the direction of Missoula, Mont. These are lines that our people will be obliged to build in the near future if they wish to hold the business of the Northwest.

3. We have also found a practicable route from Weiser, on the Oregon Short Line, up Weiser River; thence down the Little Salmon and Salmon Rivers to the mouth of the Salmon River. It is not likely that all of this will be built for many years to come, but portions of it may be built as branches to the main stem extending down Snake River.

4. The Upper Salmon country can be reached by a line running northwesterly from Camas, on the Utah and Northern Railroad, crossing the range, and thence passing down Lemhi River to Salmon City.

5. The Upper Salmon River region may also be reached by extending our line from Ketchum northwardly, crossing the Sawtooth Range, and thence probably extending down Rock Creek and beyond.

By inspecting the map inclosed herewith, upon which the lines above mentioned have been indicated, you will see that the different sections of Idaho Territory are well situated as regards projected lines of transportation, and that communication between the northern and southern portions of the Territory will be good. No detailed surveys of the Upper Salmon River country have ever been made by this company, there having arisen no demand for such surveys.

There is every probability that railroad communication between Northern and Southern Idaho will be perfected long before it will be between Idaho and Nevada.

Southern Idaho is traversed by the Oregon Short Line, which, with the projected extension down the Snake River, will in the near future be the great trunk line to the Northwest; and it will form with its tributary lines good communication between the northern and southern portions of the Territory.

Yours, respectfully,

V. G. BOGUE, C. E.

T. L. KIMBALL, Esq., Acting General Manager.

I have a map here which shows the line marked out by the railroad. When you come to the examination of the facts connected with this subject, there seems to my mind to be no reason in any direction why any part of this Territory should be segregated and attached to Washington Territory. The only thing that can be said, in my judgment, is that this panhandle, if it may be so called, would seem to make the Territory awkward in its boundary and shape; but that may be said of many States which have already been admitted into the Union. Therefore I do not regard the suggestion as to the shape of the State as affording any reason why any portion of Idaho Territory should be annexed to any other Territory or State.

Mr. President, I shall not take up the time of the Senate in discussing the propositions further, except that I would like to say, if it be in order, that in another body its committee have submitted a report on this subject, and, without reading the report at length, it concludes with the following language:

Without going further into the Territorial, mining, and agricultural interests to be affected by this proposed legislation, your committee are of the opinion that there is such a preponderance of public sentiment within the limits of the four counties to be affected and such an overwhelming objection to it in the remainder of the Territory as to constitute all-sufficient reasons why the proposed legislation should not be favored.

That was a bill to annex the counties to which I have referred to the Territory of Washington.

Your committee do therefore unanimously recommend that the aforesaid bills be laid upon the table and do not pass.

I have no feeling about this. There is nothing in it except a question of right or wrong, and possible the question of law which the honorable Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] has suggested, and I confess that he has presented authorities that would seem to be very strongly in favor of the position which he has taken upon the question. But certainly, so far as the merits of the case are concerned, if we are disposed to pay any attention whatever to the people of Idaho Territory and to do as they desire in any regard, we ought not to pass the bill reported by the honorable Senator from Nevada from the Committee on Territories, and I hope that it will not be passed, but that the substitute which I have introduced on the part of a minority of the committee, and which simply proposes to admit Washington Territory as its boundaries now exist, without any incumbrances or questions involved outside of it, may pass instead of the bill reported by the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President——

Mr. PLATT. Will the Senator from Nevada yield to me for a moment that I may suggest a formal amendment in the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM]? It will only take a moment?

On page 8 I would suggest striking out, in section 15, line 4, the words "arising within the limits of said State."

That evidently was drawn following a bill which proposed to join the two sections, and in a measure which simply proposes to admit Washington Territory as it is, it is unnecessary and improper.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chief Clerk will report the proposed amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 8, in section 15, line 4, after the word "Union," it is proposed to strike out the words "arising within the limits of said State."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By unanimous consent these words will be stricken out.

Mr. PLATT. And in section 16, line 6, strike out a similar clause, "arising within the limits of said State and."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. These words will be stricken out by unanimous consent.

Mr. STEWART. I did not suppose, Mr. President, that there could be so much said on the side of noise—so much noise made without truth, and so much misrepresentation crowded into so short a speech. I congratulate the Senator from Illinois for his capacity to befog and misrepresent the question, and get up a brood of other questions that are not now before the Senate, as if we were going to commit some great outrage. It was never intended that this Panhandle should be a part of Idaho Territory when it should become a State. In creating the Territory of Idaho, conscious, undoubtedly, as the framers of the law must have been, that they were making very irregular boundaries, they put this provision into the act:

Provided, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed to inhibit the Government of the United States from dividing said Territory or changing its boundaries in such manner and at such time as Congress shall deem convenient and proper, or from attaching any portion of said Territory to any other State or Territory in the United States.

The history of the attempt to hold these people in this unnatural political position reflects on the parties who attempt to do it.

I hold in my hand a letter from Judge Buck, one of the judges of the supreme court of Idaho Territory, which gives something of the history of this proceeding. I will ask the Clerk to read the portion of it beginning with the words "The annexation." I think it would be well to have it before the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The annexation of North Idaho to Washington Territory would take from Idaho Territory but $6,776.24 of taxes annually, and but $4,092,103 of taxable property. If it is true that this loss of revenue is a good reason why the wishes of North Idaho for such annexation should not be gratified, then it follows that citizens of one State should not be allowed to migrate from that State to another, because they might diminish the taxable property of one State for the benefit of another. Yet South Idaho claims that for the small revenue of $6,776.24 fifteen thousand people in North Idaho must be held in connection with a country removed from them by ranges of mountains over which a wagon-road can not be successfully made and with which they have no interest in common.

I also refer briefly to the financial condition of the Territory, as is shown by the comptroller's report, page 46. The indebtedness is $155,494.77. Of this $46,715.06 is due December 1, 1891. This debt has existed since 1877 or 1878. By reference to the comptroller's report for 1883-'84, hereto attached, page 26, it will be seen that in November of 1884 there was in the Territorial treasury $56,490.54, which if applied at that time to the payment of our indebtedness as appears on page 29 of said report would have left only a debt of $12,758.

This, however, was not done, but expensive buildings, consisting of a capital building at Boisé City and an insane asylum at Blackfoot, both in South Idaho, were built by legislative appropriation. South Idaho having four-fifths of the population, can, of course, control the expenditure of the public money for her own benefit. Not one dollar has ever been expended for any public improvement in North Idaho, and the reason assigned has always been, "North Idaho will be annexed to Washington, and we ought not to expend the public funds for improvements which will soon belong to another Territory." We accept the soundness of the reasoning, and now ask simply that, having contributed for improvements in South Idaho, we be permitted to go to Washington as in good faith we are entitled to do. As I have said, our present indebtedness is $155,494.77.

The comptroller's report, 1885-'86, attached hereto, page 46, shows this indebtedness to be as follows:

Bonds, due 1891	$46,715.06
Capitol building bonds of 1885	80,000.00
Insane asylum bonds of 1885	20,000.00
On warrants outstanding	8,779.71

In 1884 both the Republican and Democratic parties in our Territory, by a distinct plank in their platforms, approved of the annexation of North Idaho to Washington Territory. At that time, as I have before shown, the indebtedness of the Territory above the money in the treasury was but $12,758.06.

Since that pledge was made the Territory has issued its bonds to the amount of $10,000,000 for capital buildings and insane asylum in South Idaho, and, instead of expending the surplus of 1884 in paying the indebtedness then existing against the Territory, have expended said surplus in furnishing and equipping the capital building and insane asylum. Thus it will be seen that the present indebtedness of the Territory has been nearly all contracted since both political parties pledged themselves to support and accede to the annexation of North Idaho to Washington Territory, and that it has all been expended in South Idaho. I refer to the expressions of both parties on this subject in their platforms in 1884 and to the council memorial of the Legislature adopted in 1884-'85, here inserted:

This was the Republican plank:

"Resolved, That the wishes of North Idaho in regard to annexation to Washington Territory should be faithfully and justly represented in Congress. It is a question of local importance with that section and demands recognition and support in proportion to the unanimity of their expression on that subject."

This was the Democratic plank:

"Resolved, That we recognize the full weight, justice, importance, and final result of the claim of our citizens of Northern Idaho in their annexation views, and here in open convention, backed by an honest Democracy, we pledge to our northern neighbors a willingness and co-operation on our part to accede to their wishes on this proposition in a mutuality of feeling that shall bind us together fraternally now and sow the seed of eternal friendship when the separation may come, and we ask our northern friends to accept this pledge in the honesty of its intentions and with the full assurance it is based upon the promise of a permanent, resident, political organization and not the imported vibrations of homeless, faithless, wandering political mendicants."

In the political conventions of 1886 of both parties, after consultation, both conventions decided that no new expressions on the question of annexation should be made by either party, and the present Delegate in Congress, Mr. DUBOIS, went before the people and sought their votes. In North Idaho he stated to the people in Nez Perces that while he, as a South Idaho man, was personally opposed to annexation, as Delegate, if elected, would not oppose their wishes in reference thereto officially.

His manuscript speech containing this pledge is now in the hands of the Hon. CHARLES VOORHEES, Delegate from Washington Territory. The wishes of the people was expressed at the election at which he was elected in Nez Perces County by a vote of 1,450 for annexation to 50 against it. In Kootenai by a vote of 165 for annexation to Washington, 26 for Montana, and 14 to remain in Idaho. In Shoshone County and in Idaho County no record of the vote was kept, but by petitions now before you, and by personal knowledge I believe that Shoshone County is in favor of it by a majority, and I know that Idaho County is nearly unanimous for it. In addition to this Mr. DUBOIS publicly voted for the annexation of North Idaho to Washington at said election. In view of his present efforts on this question it is apparent that Mr. DUBOIS does not present fairly all the phases of this controversy.

At the last session of our Legislature I am informed and believe that a memorial was passed against such annexation. I have not been able to find it and have never seen it. I am informed, however, that Mr. DUBOIS, our Delegate, has presented it to your honorable bodies. I notice that he did not present the platforms of both political parties favoring it or the memorial of the legislative council in favor of it. I presume that the memorial of the last Legislature opposing annexation is an expressed opposition to annexation without refuting the statement of the prior Legislature as expressed in the council memorial herewith submitted as to the location of the two sections and the inaccessible region.

This can not truthfully be denied, and the remonstrance of the last Legislature, expressing simply an expression of change of sentiment without refuting the facts which justified the first memorial, indicates only that selfish regard to personal interest has overcome their sense of justice. Upon the facts vouched for and expressed in the memorial hereto attached I respectfully submitted that the annexation of North Idaho to Washington Territory is necessary to their happiness and prosperity, and to refuse the request would inflict an enduring hardship upon her people.

I have the honor to be, respectfully,

NORMAN BUCK.

Now, the speech to which Judge Buck refers I have. It will be seen that the vote was almost unanimously in favor of annexation—the vote which was taken at the time that Mr. DUBOIS was elected—and Mr. DUBOIS made this speech to the people at the time of his election, and put it in written manuscript so that there should be no mistake about it. It is as follows:

The annexation question is the most perplexing issue in your politics.

Personally, as you know, I am opposed to the segregation of this Territory. So is my opponent, Mr. Hailey. I will not pledge myself to work officially for the passage of a bill annexing these four northern counties to Washington or Montana. I could not if I would; I would not if I could. There is a bill now pending in the Senate, based on the platforms submitted by both parties two years ago. I had nothing to do with that bill. I will not oppose it, nor have I ever opposed it.

If I am elected I do not take my seat until March 4, 1887. If the present bill becomes a law then the question is settled, and I shall not be called upon to act in the premises.

If it is not settled by the present Congress, it must be presented to the newly elected body as a new measure. In Shoshone County the question of annexation to Washington or Montana will be submitted to a vote of the people this fall. They will settle the question themselves, and if the measure is presented to Congress next year, I suppose they will demand that their wishes be respected. I concede that in this county and in Idaho County the people desire annexation to Washington.

I can only say to you that if I am elected I will represent to Congress fairly and impartially your wishes in this matter. I will present to the committees of Congress, without prejudice, any petitions you may send; I will introduce to committees any gentlemen you may send to Washington to advocate the measure as responsible and reliable, and as correctly representing the wishes of your people. I must and will do the same thing for any other section of the Territory. Officially, I must and will represent fairly and impartially every section of Idaho and the wishes of its people. I can not do less than represent all sections of the Territory, and I can not do more. If by vote Shoshone County decides in favor of Montana, I should expect the new bill to respect that choice.

I will not oppose your wishes officially; I will see officially that you are fairly heard and your claims justly represented.

There is so much conflict now on this question that, in my judgment, you should send delegations of business men, irrespective of party, to Washington to present your wishes, and then let Congress decide the issue between you.

I consider this my duty in the premises. I would not do more or less, whether you give me one vote or a thousand.

You are at liberty to publish my position all over the Territory. I do not shirk any responsibility, and demand that Mr. Hailey come forward and define his position, and that he come in time to give his views to the whole Territory.

I might go further than this. The Mormon question is the all-absorbing topic with the people of South Idaho, and that is the question which they will vote upon. It is a fight with us for existence. I could pledge myself to work for annexation, and it would not cost me 100 votes in South Idaho.

But there is not an honest man in South Idaho who would work for annexation before this question is settled; and there is not an honest man in South Idaho who would oppose annexation if the Mormon question were settled, conditions remaining as they now are.

After this speech was made a vote was taken, and the people of North Idaho agreed to annexation. It is said they have changed their views, and that nobody is now asking for annexation. That is a mistake. They are as anxious now as they ever have been. They have gone through with this contest for over twenty years. The history of this contest is a most deplorable one.

These people have been dragged from their homes and compelled to do their official business at a distant point; and all this talk about there ever being any convenient communication between them and Boisé City or Southern Idaho is nonsense. You can go around about. You can go east from the capital about 200 miles; then you can go north three or four hundred miles, and then west, and go around from Montana, or you can go west through Oregon and Washington Territories several hundred miles, and get to the capital of Idaho Territory; but to say or to pretend that there ever will be a line of railroad over the ranges of mountains that jut out from the Bitter Root range or over the Salmon River range is the merest bosh. This man who writes from the Union Pacific knows that there is no occasion to build a railroad that way. They may get around by the Snake River and get into that country, but whether there is a railroad there or not, these people, by geographical location and business interest, belong to Washington Territory, and they have had a solemn promise for many years that their wishes would no longer be opposed. This is a fight of twenty years.

I will read some resolutions recently passed at a meeting of the citizens of Moscow in the county of Latah, in North Idaho:

At a mass meeting of the citizens of Moscow, the county seat of Latah County, Territory of Idaho, held on the 5th day of June, 1888, called for the purpose of giving expression of the citizens of said county upon the subject of the annexation of North Idaho to the Territory of Washington, the following statement of facts was unanimously adopted:

"First. That we deem the annexation of North Idaho to Washington Territory so essential to the future prosperity of our people that a failure of Congress to make such annexation would, in our opinion, be a continuing disaster.

"Second. That the vote of Nez Perces County, including what is now Latah County, at the last general election for Delegate to Congress, 1885, 1,500 votes were cast for such annexation and not to exceed 50 against it. That at the same election there were cast in this city of Moscow 368 votes for said annexation and 6 votes against it. That at said election Mr. DUBOIS, our present Delegate in Congress, said to our people in a public speech, "If elected I will not oppose your wishes officially upon the subject of annexation."

Upon that promise Mr. DUBOIS received his party vote. We now declare that the wishes of our people are more earnestly in favor of annexation than ever before, and the people of Latah County call upon Mr. DUBOIS to consider his promise made to us at said election and to use his influence as our representative in Congress to secure the passage of Mr. STEWART'S bill submitting the question of such annexation to the voters of North Idaho.

Third. That whereas Governor Stevenson, our present executive, stated to the Committee on Territories of the United States Senate on the 23rd of January, 1888, "I think a majority of the people in North Idaho are opposed to such annexation" and whereas it has been claimed by our present Delegate in Congress that the sentiments of our people have changed on this subject, and that "the advent of the railroads, the development of the country, and prospect of statehood have practically united our people against such annexation: Therefore,

Resolved, That we ask that Mr. STEWART'S bill for the admission of Washington Territory as a State and providing for a submission of such annexation to our people may be enacted by Congress, that we may determine this question by a vote of the people of North Idaho.

Fourth. That the statement that the desire of our people for such annexation has grown out of a feeling of hostility of the citizens of Lewistown resulting from the removal of the capital of our Territory from Lewistown to South Idaho twenty years ago is without any foundation in fact. That our city of Moscow has ever since its existence been a rival of the city of Lewistown, and certainly we can not be charged with sympathy with any special grievance of said city, and yet our people are more unanimous if possible in favor of annexation than are the people of Lewistown. The truth is that the desire for such annexation has its inception and development in the daily life of our people, and any charge that its origin is in any feeling of jealousy or hostility to South Idaho is wholly without foundation.

Fifth. Resolved, That the statement before the Senate Committee and elsewhere by those opposed to annexation that the memorials of our Legislature and expressions in favor of annexation in the platforms of our political parties were made with the purpose of catching votes and without consideration by the parties making them, and may be disregarded at pleasure, is unworthy of an intelligent people and reflect only the dishonor of those who make them. We denounce such statements as dishonorable and unjust. It is such action by the people of South Idaho that has created dissension between the people of North and South Idaho and rendered it impossible for us to act in harmony with them. In this spirit of want of faith in the declarations of the people of South Idaho we approve the action of L. P. Brown and C. B. Reynolds in withdrawing from the late Republican convention and thus preventing our people from being compromised by the action of a convention who regard their most solemn promise and pledges as mere party tricks made to entrap our voters.

W. J. MCCONNELL, Chairman.
JOHN MOORE, Secretary.

The other resolutions read by the Senator from Illinois of the Republican convention held last May in Boisé City were passed without the consent of North Idaho and do not represent their views.

I have a similar set of resolutions to those I have just read which were passed in Latah County, adopted last month at a mass-meeting held in Idaho County, the southernmost county of the Panhandle. They are equally emphatic on the subject. I have a memorial here which is lengthy and which I have not attempted to read, but which gives a history of the persecutions of the people of North Idaho by the people of South Idaho—the manner in which they have been used, the pledges which have been broken, etc.

Talk about "Poland," talk about "dismemberment," when here are a people that have been promised for twenty years that they would be relieved from this unnatural association, that they should have the association of their business friends, and that they would have the benefit of political and commercial relations with the same people; when both parties in their platforms agreed that this should be done; when the representative that is now here went before them and said that their wishes should be respected officially and in every other way; when those people, on that declaration by Mr. DUBOIS, voted for him and voted for annexation, we did not expect any opposition from that source. How can we be charged with bad faith when the bad faith is all on the other side? It is said that they have not agreed that this division should be made. Has not that been the understanding by both political parties? It is admitted that that was the public sentiment for years and that in justice it ought to be done.

In order that the Senate may understand this question, I will read a little more of this history to see how it corresponds with the story of the Senator from Illinois. I read from the memorial of the convention of citizens representing the various counties of Northern Idaho:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

Washington Territory originally included what is now North Idaho. In 1863 the one hundred and seventeenth meridian was made the dividing line between Washington and Idaho, through the action of the then Delegate from Washington. In 1863-'64 the Territory of Montana was organized out of a part of Idaho, with other territory, making its western boundary the crest of the Bitter Root Mountains. This left the northern portion of Idaho only about 40 miles in width, and the greater portion of this width was the spurs of the Bitter Roots—rugged and unsuitable for settlement. Immediately after these unnatural limits for North Idaho were fixed efforts were made to change them to better suit our condition.

It was first proposed to form a new Territory east of the Columbia River so as to include North Idaho. This failing, we then made efforts to be detached from South Idaho and become attached to Washington, and these efforts have been persistently continued up to the present time by petitions from the people, memorials from our Legislature and that of Washington.

The Legislature of Washington in the winter of 1877-'78 passed an act authorizing the calling of a convention to frame a constitution for the State of Washington. To that convention they invited a delegate from the northern counties of Idaho, with the view to include them within the boundaries of the proposed State.

These counties responded and unanimously chose a delegate to represent them in that convention, and Washington paid the expenses of that delegate. The convention assembled at Walla Walla and framed a constitution, including within the limits of the proposed State the northern counties of Idaho (the same boundaries as proposed in the Brents bill and now proposed in our memorials), and made provisions for the submission of said constitution to the people of both Washington and North Idaho. The people of both sections, at a special election for that purpose, adopted the constitution by more than a two-thirds vote of all the votes polled, while among all the people of North Idaho only 34 votes out of nearly 800 were polled against the constitution.

Mr. Brents, then Delegate from Washington, in the succeeding Congress introduced a bill to admit the State of Washington under that constitution, but consideration of that bill did not induce any report from the committee, because of the deemed insufficient population.

The Legislature of Washington in 1881-'82 passed a memorial for an enabling act to include the northern counties of Idaho, and the lower house of the Idaho Legislature passed a memorial to the effect that when Washington should be admitted that the northern counties of Idaho should become a part of the new State.

Again, to convince Congress and the world that the people of North Idaho had not changed in opinion since voting upon the constitution in the fall of 1878, the question was again submitted to them at the general election of 1880, and the result showed 1,216 votes for annexation and only 7 against. But a time still more auspicious came in the election of 1882, when the question became the vital issue, Mr. Ainslie opposing and Mr. Singiser advocating. The people of the north had called a convention for the purpose of nominating an independent candidate who would represent their wishes. When the convention assembled Mr. Singiser was present, and by a written pledge secured the indorsement of the convention.

He then took the field and made an open and square fight both north and south on that issue. He carried the election by a majority in the south of 1,500, while in the north he received a majority of 1,443 votes out of 1,853 that were polled, giving him an aggregate majority in the Territory of about 3,000, showing conclusively that not only were the people of the north for it, but that the south, as well, were convinced of the justice of our cause and were willing to do right and let us go.

Again, in 1884, Mr. Singiser was nominated by the Republicans and Mr. Hailey by the Democrats. Both conventions, in which South Idaho had a large majority, inserted in their platforms an annexation plank—by the Republican, as a matter of course, for Singiser had previously won upon that issue; by the Democratic, as a matter of force, in order to regain its party vote in the North. This was the Republican plank:

"Resolved, That the wishes of North Idaho, in regard to annexation to Washington Territory, should be faithfully and justly represented in Congress. It is a question of local importance with that section, and demands recognition and support in proportion to the unanimity of their expression on that subject."

This was the Democratic plank:

Resolved, That we recognize the full weight, justice, importance, and final result of the claim of our citizens of Northern Idaho in their annexation views, and here in open convention, backed by an honest Democracy, we pledge to our northern neighbors a willingness and co-operation on our part to accede to their wishes on this proposition in a mutuality of feeling that shall bind us together fraternally now and sow the seed of eternal friendship when the separation may come, and we ask our northern friends to accept this pledge in the honesty of its intentions, and with the full assurance it is based upon the promise of a permanent resident political organization, and not the imported vibrations of homeless, faithless, wandering political mendicants.

That is putting it pretty strong. They talk about this being "trumped up" and "trying to dismember." Again:

Resolved, That the nominee of this convention pledge himself to support the principles herein promulgated.

So Mr. Hailey went before the people upon such plank and pledge, and because of such received the support of his party in the north and was elected. Here, then, the edict went forth from the whole people of the Territory that the north should be allowed to go. We say, therefore, that whatever opposition there may be is but the nursings of rings—the traitorous machinations of a sordid crew. These unscrupulous tricksters have repeatedly falsified our sentiments and vilified our character, and with unbounded effrontery have ignored the wishes and solemn expressions of our section and the Territory at large. The people generally, true to their pledges, have stood nobly by us. During the second session of the Forty-ninth Congress a bill for annexation passed both Houses, and failed to become a law only by the inaction of the President.

During the pendency of that bill a diversion was attempted in favor of annexation to Montana, but it most signally failed, it being seen that the efforts of our friends in Congress were sustained by very extensive memorials from our people, and we have never failed at any opportunity to manifest our unwavering demand for this great boon. Now, at this time, do we make this added appeal in all the strength of our manhood, in the sovereignty of our American citizenship, and plead that the voice of a wronged and oppressed people may once more be heard and finally and favorably answered. Our enemies have resorted to every method to defeat our wishes—sending false messages, stealing our petitions, and traducing our character.

Again in 1886 this question having been settled so far as the sentiment of the people is concerned, the parties settled back to the support of their respective candidates to a great extent; still there was enough connected with this question to make the north alive to its interests in this regard. For instance, Mr. Hailey had not appeared before us in the campaign to reaffirm his position, which caused many Democrats and Republicans both to doubt him, while Mr. DUBOIS had pledged himself not to oppose our wishes on annexation to Washington, thus gaining the support of those of both parties who doubted Mr. Hailey; still the distrust of Mr. DUBOIS, who had said that he could not advocate it, gave Mr. Hailey, who had advocated it in Congress, a majority in the north of 530. Other forces had operated in the south, among them the Mormon question, sufficiently to give the election to Mr. DUBOIS. At that election the people of Nez Perces County had been invited to vote on the question, and the return showed 1,679 votes in favor and only 26 opposed.

The reasons for desiring that North Idaho be annexed to Washington are:

1. The union of North and South Idaho is and always has been disastrous to all the material interests of the people of the northern section. If the imaginary line now constituting the western boundary of North Idaho were abrogated, and this section restored to its original and natural position as a part of Washington, the value of the property of her citizens would be increased by hundreds of thousands of dollars. Immigration now stops within Washington Territory and crosses into Idaho with reluctance, because of the remoteness of her prospects for statehood. With agricultural resources unsurpassed, except in extent, the development of them is retarded beyond a present power of computation by reason of our isolated condition consequent upon a political connection with a section from which we are practically separated as from any State in the Union. To remain thus permanently separated from the basin of the Columbia, of which we are naturally a part, is and always will be absolutely ruinous to our prosperity.

2. North and South Idaho are separated by natural boundaries. Between the two is a mountain range impassable except on horseback or on foot over rugged mountain trails in summer, and in winter except on snow-shoes. There has never been a wagon-road and never can be a practicable one. The Salmon River Mountains, which constitute this range, are at least 60 miles wide, extending east and west across the entire Territory.

3. The only route of travel between the two, by private or public conveyance, except as before stated, is by a wide detour westward through Washington Territory and the State of Oregon over the Blue Mountains, or northward through Washington and Montana.

4. Our remoteness from and inaccessibility to the seat of the Territorial government deprives us of all the protection a government should afford to every section of its domain. North Idaho, with comparatively small area, is the present home of a large number of Indians. In it are the Nez Percé, Cour d'Alenes, Pend d'Oreilles, a part of Kootenais, permanently, and the Spokanes roam through the northern portion thereof. There is no prospect of these tribes being removed therefrom. We are subject, therefore, in the future, as we have been in the past, to sudden and cruel savage outbreaks.

When the Indian war under Chief Joseph broke upon our people in 1877 we appealed to the governor for aid, but his reply was: "We have no arms to spare for so long a distance, and that aid could reach us from other sources sooner than from Boisé, our capital." General Howard attempted to aid us by a command sent from South Idaho through the nearest and most accessible route. This command, under a brave and energetic officer, pushed forward with the utmost dispatch until it reached the southern base of the Salmon River Mountains, within 80 miles of our people.

It sought to make a wagon-road and cross this barrier, but was obliged to turn back before the difficulties of this mountain range. Although within 80 miles of the point where men, women, and children were being massacred with ruthless cruelty, this command was obliged to leave our people to their fate, and to come to the rescue, if at all, by passing through Oregon and Washington, a distance of not less than 600 miles. Governor Ferry, of Washington Territory, came at once to our aid, and, though beyond the jurisdiction of his Territory, loaned us arms and munitions of war.

Thus this savage warfare was stayed by aid from the Territory to which we ask to be annexed, and could naturally come from no other source. We take the broad ground that the south has no right to speak in this matter; themselves wards of the Government, they have no right to ask that we of the north shall suffer a lifetime of obnoxious servitude that they may be benefited. Here we are, practically a united people, telling you that our social, commercial, and political welfare demands our attachment to Washington.

We claim this in accordance with the principles of popular sovereignty. We stand in like position as did the district of Maine, which struggled for thirty years for her independence, which was accorded her upon a vote of five-ninths of her people; as did West Virginia, which came in a creature of circumstances. Have we less rights than they? We came from those States, relinquishing for the time our status as sovereigns to develop the resources of this Western land for the benefit of ourselves and our Government. Has the Government no return to make for this sacrifice?

What occurred in 1877 may occur at any time in the future. The Government in South Idaho can only draw revenue from our taxable property. It can afford no protection from impending danger. Between the two sections there can be no commercial intercourse. Neither has products which find a market in the other, and no transportation routes from either to the markets of the world passes through the other. The products have heretofore passed westward to the Pacific, and will in the future take the same course, except such as may find eastern markets passing over the Northern Pacific. No political or material interests of South Idaho will be affected by the annexation of North Idaho to Washington.

All her resources could be harmoniously developed by herself. It is claimed by those who oppose annexation that the severance of North Idaho would leave South Idaho subservient to Mormon rule. This plea is fallacious and designed simply to prejudice the minds of those not acquainted with the facts. That this is true we have only to point to the fact that this question has been settled both by Congressional and legislative enactment in the disfranchisement of the polygamists. It has been said that the annexation of North Idaho to Washington would make the proposed State of Washington unstately.

An eminent statesman has said that the boundaries of States should be as God and nature designed them, and you may look all over this great nation and you will ever find that wherever practicable this principle has been adhered to. We presume that boundaries not conformable to this principle are not desirable. The boundaries of North Idaho as to all north of the Salmon River range are contrary to this principle and unnaturally sever us from Washington and unite us to Idaho.

The truth is that the present awkward shape of Idaho and the consequent unfortunate condition of our boundaries are the result of political intrigue of aspirants for office. Its present boundaries, as far as North Idaho is concerned, were established without the knowledge and against the wishes of the people directly interested, and since their establishment our efforts to restore our section of the Territory to its former state have been constantly adhered to.

Were the present eastern boundary of Washington Territory at the crest of the Bitter Root Mountains, including North Idaho, and southward to the crest of the Salmon River range, as a southern boundary, the natural boundaries would be restored, and the entire Columbia River basin would be included within the State of Washington. This would leave Idaho of a nearly rectangular shape, with all sections easily accessible from its center, and with an area of 60,000 square miles; larger in extent than either Alabama, Arkansas, Georgia, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Minnesota, Nebraska, New York, Pennsylvania, or Wisconsin. While the State of Washington would have an area about 90,000 square miles, smaller than Arizona, Wyoming, Colorado, Montana, Dakota, New Mexico, Oregon, Nevada, and California.

It will be claimed that a divided sentiment exists among our people; that no inconsiderable part desire to go to Montana. We assert that while a few indicated last winter such a disposition, even many of those now are convinced of the impracticability of that scheme, and now join in our petition for annexation to Washington, and were the question now submitted to a vote would be carried overwhelmingly. There are petitions duly authenticated by affidavits now on file before you, and which will speak for our cause; affidavits of the theft of memorials, and other data to which we urgently invite your most candid concern.

We would add more, but is it necessary? The action of your honorable body at the very last session in passing this measure would seem to render a further discussion superfluous, and we submit our cause and pray for favorable action.

Now, there is a history of the transaction. All that has been got up since is in bad faith and in violation of the promises of twenty years. However vehemently it may be uttered, and however thoroughly it may be lobbied by the ambitious governor of Idaho Territory, who wants to be a Senator, I say however he may lobby this thing (he has been here through the winter), whatever may be done in that way, the fact remains—nature made this a part of Washington.

It is in the great Columbia basin. The common consent of all decent people for the last twenty years has been given to it. The idea of attempting to reverse that judgment now, after it has passed this body two or three times, and after it has passed the other body, to change the basis of the thing without a further hearing and giving the people of North Idaho a chance to say one word about it, is monstrous.

In view of the suggestion that there was a change of sentiment and that they ought to be heard, the majority of the committee have provided that this question shall be presented to the people interested and the only people interested—the people of North Idaho. The people of South Idaho have no interest in it whatever, because they have no right to tax the people of North Idaho without their consent. So I say there is every reason of sentiment, of good faith, and of honor in favor of the committee's bill.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, July 18, 1888.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

GENERAL JOHN C. FRÉMONT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (S. 2395) authorizing the President to appoint and retire John C. Frémont as a major-general in the United States Army; which was read twice and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

SUFFERERS BY THE WRECK OF THE TALLAPOOSA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a bill (S. 869) for the relief of the sufferers by the wreck of the United States steamer Tallapoosa, with the disagreement of the Senate to the amendments of the House, and a request for a committee of conference.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the House will agree to a conference as requested by the Senate, and the Chair will appoint as managers of the conference on the part of the House the gentleman from New York, Mr. TIMOTHY J. CAMPBELL, the gentleman from New Hampshire, Mr. MCKINNEY, and the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. KERR.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. HIESTAND, for twelve days, on account of business.

To Mr. WHITING, of Michigan, indefinitely, on account of important business.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. COMPTON, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of E. C. Carrington.

BUSINESS REPORTED FROM THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY.

Mr. CULBERSON. On behalf of the Committee on the Judiciary I ask unanimous consent that the House take a recess at 5 o'clock on the 26th of July until 8 o'clock, p. m., the evening session not to extend beyond the hour of 10.30 p. m., and to be devoted exclusively to bills reported from the Committee on the Judiciary to which there may be no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. PETERS. I have no objection if the evening session is made to terminate at 10 o'clock instead of at 10.30.

Mr. CULBERSON. I will so modify the request.

There was no objection to the request for the evening session, and it was ordered.

PUBLIC BUILDING, YONKERS, N. Y.

Mr. STAHLNECKER. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 1676) to erect a public building at Yonkers, N. Y., and that it be now considered in the House.

The bill was read, with the amendments recommended by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. GLASS. I object.

PUBLIC BUILDING, KALAMAZOO, MICH.

Mr. BURROWS. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 7595) for the erection of a public building at the city of Kalamazoo, Mich., and that the bill be now considered in the House.

The bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. COBB. I would like to hear the report read.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then I object.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, is there objection made to this bill?

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes. The gentleman from Alabama demands the reading of the report, and that would take too long at this time.

Mr. BURROWS. I do not think my friend from Alabama will insist upon the reading of the report. The receipts from the office at Kalamazoo are over $40,000 annually.

Mr. COBB. I do not understand, Mr. Speaker, why the Committee of the Whole is to be discharged from the consideration of bills of this kind and they are to be put through here in this expeditious manner.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] has objected, and the matter is not before the House.

SELECT COMMITTEE ON CONTRACT LABOR, ETC.

Mr. FORD. I ask unanimous consent to offer the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk, and to have it considered at this time.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the select committee to inquire into the importation of contract laborers, convicts, and paupers be, and they are hereby, authorized to employ such additional messengers and other assistants as may, in the judgment of said committee, be deemed necessary; and that the sum of —— thousand dollars, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to pay the expenses of said committee shall be immediately available and payable out of the contingent fund of the House on the order of the chairman and one member of said committee, in sums not exceeding $1,000 at one time; and all vouchers for any such expenditure shall be likewise certified to by the chairman and one member of the committee; and said committee may report at any time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution?

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I object.

Mr. BLAND. Regular order.

Mr. FORD. I ask the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] to withdraw that demand, so that I may introduce this resoultion for reference.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Mr. Chairman, I object, for the reason that an investigation that goes no further than the investigation of contract labor will amount to nothing. This has been done over and over. There are other classes of immigration that should be embraced in any investigation that is undertaken by this House, and unless this is proposed in some efficient way I am opposed to incurring the expense of a committee.

Mr. FORD. Does the gentleman object to the resolution being referred?

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I object to its reference to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. FORD. I ask unanimous consent that it be referred to the Committee on Accounts.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed the bill (S. 405) providing for the adjustment of accounts of laborers, workmen, and mechanics arising under the eight-hour law; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BLAND. Regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded. The regular order is the call of committees for reports.

Mr. MILLS. I ask unanimous consent that the morning hour for the call of committees be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS]?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I shall object unless some arrangement is made by which reports can be filed with the Clerk.

Mr. MILLS. I have always included that in the request, and I do so now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] asks unanimous consent that the morning hour be dispensed with, and that gentlemen having reports to make may have leave to file them with the Clerk.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The following reports were filed by being handed in at the Clerk's desk:

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

Several messages, in writing, from the President of the United States were communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, who also announced that bills of the following titles, having been presented to the President July 5, 1888, and not having been returned by him to the House in which they originated within the ten days prescribed by the Constitution, had become laws without his approval:

An act (H. R. 964) granting a pension to James Turner;
An act (H. R. 2193) granting a pension to Elisha Wilkins;
An act (H. R. 3772) granting a pension to Perry D. Martin;
An act (H. R. 9649) granting a pension to Milton Merwin;
An act (H. R. 2640) for the relief of Judith A. Kinsey; and An act (H. R. 9679) for the relief of William N. Robb.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MILLS. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of bills raising revenue.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue.

The CHAIRMAN. By unanimous consent the Committee of the Whole will now return to such portions of this bill as have been passed over informally during its consideration. The first paragraph is that in the beginning of the bill in regard to the date at which the bill shall take effect.

Mr. MILLS. I move to amend by striking out "July" and inserting "October."

Mr. ADAMS. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "October" and inserting "January, 1889."

The amendment of Mr. ADAMS to the amendment of Mr. MILLS was rejected.

The question recurring on the amendment of Mr. MILLS, it was agreed to.

Mr. TRACEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to move an amendment to the amendment already adopted on motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RUSSELL]. The amendment, as adopted, reads: "Alizarine, natural or artificial, and other dyes or colors produced from anthracine." I move to amend by striking out in that amendment all after the word "artificial;" so as to read: "Alizarine, natural or artificial."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. TRACEY] asks unanimous consent to submit the amendment which has been stated. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I wish to state to my colleague [Mr. TRACEY] that under the present law alizarine, natural or artificial, is on the free-list, so that if he allows those words to stand in the bill they are simply a repetition of the existing law. Why not make the motion to strike out the whole amendment as already adopted? That would be a proper motion.

Mr. TRACEY. The gentleman is correct in his suggestion. I move to strike out the entire amendment.

Mr. FARQUHAR. That is correct. We are then in line with the law.

Mr. DINGLEY. I would like to hear from the gentleman from New York [Mr. TRACEY] the reasons for this amendment.

Mr. TRACEY. The reason is that if we permit the other colors produced from anthracine to come in free, five colors now on the dutiable-list will be placed on the free-list; and this interferes with the entire arrangement of the law.

Mr. REED. How does it interfere with the arrangement of the law? I hope the gentleman will explain the effect of the amendment.

Mr. TRACEY. There are five colors produced from anthracine which would be placed on the free-list if the amendment, as already adopted, should become the law.

Mr. REED. And that would be for the benefit of the consumers.

Mr. TRACEY. Perhaps it would be; but it would be inconsistent with the present law.

Mr. REED. The whole bill is inconsistent with the present law.

Mr. TRACEY. I am not going to enter into a discussion about that. I presume that my present amendment, which puts on the dutiable-list five colors which otherwise under this bill would be on the free-list, is in accord with what the gentleman from Maine would desire.

Mr. REED. What is the reason for making a distinction in favor of these and not of others?

Mr. TRACEY. There is no distinction being made. Alizarine is at present on the free-list. Now, if you bring in anthracine and its colors you increase the free-list.

Mr. REED. Is that what you want to do, or not?

Mr. TRACEY. I do not want to do it in this case.

Mr. REED. Why not in this case? It is one of the "raw materials" of manufacture, is it not?

Mr. TRACEY. Anthracine?

Mr. REED. Yes, sir.

Mr. TRACEY. No; it is not a raw material.

Mr. REED. In what does it differ from raw material?

Mr. DINGLEY. It is a raw material in the manufacture of textile fabrics.

Mr. REED. I want to get at the difference between these and other colors—the difference which constitutes a reason why these should be dutiable and the others not.

Mr. TRACEY. The difference, Mr. Chairman, is this: All dye colors are dutiable, but coal-tar products are the raw material from which the dyes are made; and this bill has put those coal-tar products on the free-list, so that the manufacturer of these dyes in this country will be able to produce them without paying a duty on the raw material. In the tariff bill of 1883 the duties on coal-tar dyes were decreased, but the coal-tar product, the raw material, was left with a duty of 20 per cent. Now, in the State in which I live and the district I represent there was a large aniline company carrying on business which was entirely destroyed by reason of the injudicious change in the bill which took the duties off of the manufactured article and left it on the raw material. The Mills bill wisely takes it from the coal-tar product, the 20 per cent. duty, and leaves the industry in a condition to be again built up in this country.

Mr. REED. This industry is in your district?

Mr. TRACEY. There is an aniline manufacturing company in my district.

Mr. REED. And that is the industry you desire to have protected at the expense of the consumers in your district?

Mr. TRACEY. Not all. It does not affect the consumers in my district, because——

Mr. REED. Well, what is the geographical situation of the industry? Where is it?

Mr. TRACEY. It does not seem to me that that pertains to the matter under discussion.

Mr. REED. Well, will you not have the kindness, then, to give the information we seek as to its locality?

Mr. TRACEY. I decline to state anything further. It is not necessary to take the time of the committee.

Mr. REED. You decline to state the geographical location of the industry? I leave you, then, to the tender mercies of your colleague [Mr. COX], who sits in front of you. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. TRACEY. I want to offer one further amendment by consent, in this same line of duties.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will be read subject to the right of objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 184 strike out the word "primuline."

Mr. BAYNE. We have not got over to that part of the bill yet.

The CHAIRMAN. This is a request for unanimous consent.

Mr. TRACEY. It is in the same line as the amendment just adopted.

Mr. BAYNE. Oh! you are jumping around. All right.

Mr. REED. I do not know what the amendment is, but if we can have the geography of it we will probably give our consent to the request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to returning to this part of the bill?

Mr. WARNER. I have no objection if the gentleman will frankly state that this amendment like the other is for the purpose of securing votes in his district.

Mr. TRACEY. Primuline, Mr. Chairman, is a dye that comes in the same as the aniline dyes. It is at present subject to a duty of 35 per cent. Putting it on the free-list would enable the importers to bring in this dye and use it in connection with the raw material to interfere with the production of dye in this country. It seems to me there is no reason that it should be on the free-list any more than any aniline dyes.

Referring to the remarks of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WARNER], I desire to state that my motive in offering these amendments was not to change the bill for the purpose of securing votes in my district. But, Mr. Chairman, I do not deem it improper for this committee to bear in mind the interests and wishes of voters. Great efforts are being made on the part of opponents of this bill to alarm the people who labor, and many untruthful statements are being circulated.

I believe, however, that when this bill has been completed and laid before the country the workingmen will appreciate the thoughtful care the framers of it have taken in guarding proper interests of both capital and labor, and if votes be gained to the Democratic party it will be because they have been deserved. I trust that throughout the entire country people will study this bill and read the arguments made for and against it. What we want is an examination of it in connection with the existing law.

It will be found that the case I have cited of injury having been done an industry by the tariff made by a Republican Congress in 1883 is not an isolated one.

The workingmen will discover that with increased work and materials cheapened their employers should be ready to pay more liberal wages when the entire cost of the article produced is lessened. They will learn that while trusts now exist, some of them having nothing to do with the tariff, the yet unborn trusts that must follow prohibitory duties will make the monopolist absolutely independent of the laborer, and that with a conservative tariff this can not take place.

The cry of our forming a bill to catch votes will do us no injury. It gave me great pleasure, although not affecting my district, to urge the Committee on Ways and Means to continue duties on lime, cement, and other articles. It is to the credit of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] and his associates, that they seek to avoid such mistakes as occurred when the 1883 tariff was forced through the House in a shameful manner.

I am anxious for the passage of this bill, because it will be a benefit to the country with its free wool, free unmanufactured lumber, etc.; but if the Senate in its examination should discover mistakes, corrections can be made in conference. It would be a benefit to this country to increase the export trade, and this bill has that in view.

Mr. Gladstone spoke at Leeds, England, in 1881. I quote from a newspaper:

WHAT GLADSTONE SAYS—THE AMERICAN SYSTEM OF PROTECTION FAVORS BRITISH COMMERCE.

Well, now, there is also an idea that America is pursuing a course of profound wisdom in regard to its protective system, and we are told that under the blessed shelter of a system of that kind the tender infancy of trades is cherished, which afterwards, having obtained vigor, will go forth into neutral markets and possess the world. Gentlemen, is that true? America has been too long in various degrees a protective country.

Have the manufacturers of America gone forth and possessed the world? How do they compete with you in those quarters of the world which are, speaking generally, outside the influences of protection? Gentlemen, to the whole of Asia, to the whole of Africa, and to the whole of Australasia—which in the main are outside this question and may fairly be described in the rough as presenting to us neutral markets, where we meet America without fear or favor one way or the other—the whole of the exports of the United States of manufactured goods of those countries amount to £4,751,000, while the exports to those same quarters from the United Kingdom were £78,140,000.

Gentlemen, the fact is this: America is a young country, with enormous vigor and enormous internal resources. She has committed—I say it, I hope, not with disrespect; I say it with strong and cordial sympathy, but with much regret—she is committing errors of which we set her an example. But from the enormous resources of her home market, the development of which internally is not touched by protection, she is able to commit those errors with less fatal consequences upon her people than we experienced when we committed them; and the enormous development of American resources within casts almost entirely into the shade the puny character of the export of her manufactures to the neutral markets of the world. * * * I will say this, that as long as America adheres to the protective system your commercial primacy is secure. Nothing in the world can wrest it from you while America continues to fetter her own strong hands and arms, and with these fettered arms is content to compete with you, who are free, in neutral markets.

This quotation appears to me to give food for earnest reflection. A visitor to this House might suppose that the gentlemen who are constantly abusing the Mills bill and any idea of tariff reform were sent here to speak for labor alone. I believe that I can truthfully say the laboring people in my district are most friendly to me, and I would vote for no bill that would injure them. I am glad to be able to print in the RECORD two most interesting interviews with gentlemen to whom alone will I yield a right greater than my privilege of speaking for labor's interest.

LABOR'S INTEREST—REPRESENTATIVE WORKINGMEN FAVOR TARIFF REFORM—THE CONTEST AGAINST MONOPOLY—VIEWS OF THE TWO KNIGHTS OF LABOR MEMBERS OF CONGRESS—STRAIGHTFORWARD WORDS TO LABOR.

[Correspondence of the Argus.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 15, 1888.

Organized labor has two representatives on the floor of the House of Representatives, and the steady support which these men give the bill to reduce tariff taxes, known as the Mills bill, has already convinced many Republican Congressmen that the attempt to get up a "workingmen's scare," as they call it among themselves, will be a failure. These two labor representatives are Congressmen HENRY SMITH, of the Fourth Wisconsin district, and Congressman SAMUEL J. HOPKINS, of the Sixth Virginia district.

Mr. SMITH is about fifty years of age, and is a carpenter and millwright by trade. He has a common-school education and plenty of common sense, industry, and acquaintance with men and facts, worth more than a college education. He is the State master workman of the Knights of Labor of Wisconsin, and as a representative workingman he has several times been chosen to responsible public offices, having been a member of the Milwaukee common council and of the Wisconsin Legislature. He was elected to Congress as the candidate of the Labor party, polling 13,355 votes, against 9,645 for the Republican nominee and 8,233 for the Democratic nominee.

At the previous election the district had elected a Republican by a vote of 16,783 to 15,967 for the Democrat. Congressman SMITH sits on the Republican side of the House of Representatives. Congressman HOPKINS was a carpenter and is a dealer in merchant saddlery. He is forty-five years old, and for several years has been one of the most influential members of the Knights of Labor in Virginia. He is and always has been a Democrat, but was elected to Congress as the candidate of the Knights of Labor by a vote of 9,470 to 9,020 over the regular Democratic nominee. At the previous election the district gave 3,000 straight Democratic majority. Congressman HOPKINS is influential, not only among the labor organizations of his own State, but is known to labor organizations throughout the country.

The Argus correspondent obtained an introduction to and then secured interviews with the two representatives of organized labor in the Fiftieth Congress on the tariff-reduction bill. Both have spoken in the House in support of separate items of the bill, but their general views on the measure, as it relates to labor and employment, are of interest throughout the country. The interviews follow:

REDUCE THE TAXES ON LABORING MEN.

Congressman SMITH, when asked his views on tariff legislation and the Mills bill, said: "My opinions on this matter are the result of careful, conscientious, and, I hope, intelligent study of what are the needs of the country and especially of laboring men, who make up the country's strength. The tariff is a tax and no amount of talking in Congress or in the newspapers or anywhere else can make it seem to be anything else. The people of this country can not be made happy or prosperous by taxing them, and until the last few years any one who maintained that this could be done would be laughed at. As the tariff is a tax it should be levied on luxuries and thus the tax put on those who can best afford to pay the taxes.

"That is the true way to reform the present tariff. The Mills bill, as it is called, is a moderate effort to reduce taxes on the necessaries of life and I shall vote, if I have a chance, to go even further, and shall support all measures to lighten the load of taxes on the shoulders of labor, which is both the producing and the consuming element of our population. I shall vote for free coal and free sugar as I have already voted for free lumber. Tariff taxation, to my way of thinking, is not a blessing, and men who work for wages and have thought about it, as I have, always reach this same conclusion.

"THE TWIN MONOPOLIES.

"Tariff taxation is not the only obstacle the producing element—by which, of course, I mean labor—has to contend against in this country. I may say, in passing, that the matter of transportation and the absorption of our public lands by aggregated capital, foreign or domestic, is of as great importance to labor as the tariff, and perhaps of greater importance. Excessive railroad freights and discriminations in charges weigh down upon American labor as heavily as tariff taxation.

"I will go so far as to say that if the railroads of the country were put in the same condition as our rivers and national water ways, if they were not controlled by corporations, bound to make traffic pay every cent it can stagger under, American labor would need no tariff at all. It could not only defy the whole world at home, but compete with the whole world. This is an extreme position, but a moment's reflection will show you that excessive railroad charges are an obstacle in the way of American production which do much to hamper its development. The profit to be made in railroads is one reason for the decadence of our merchant marine. When men make more money out of transportation companies on stable American soil than they can from ships on the uncertain ocean, of course they will put their money in railroads. This problem is an important one to labor, though often overlooked.

"PUBLIC LANDS MUST BE RESERVED.

"The absorption of public lands in the West by railroad companies and by foreign corporations is a matter of great consequence to all who have at heart the interests of labor, not only for this generation but for the future. Those lands must be reserved for actual settlers. This subject and the matter of the currency are important. But to return to the tariff.

"WAGES AND THE TARIFF.

"I believe all the necessaries of life should be made as cheap as possible to the consumer by reduced taxation. It is not true that a reduction of the tariff will reduce the wages of either skilled or unskilled labor.

"The cry that wages will be reduced is started by combinations of capital for their own selfish purposes, and this is so evident that I am surprised men should not clearly see the fact. I have no Blackstonian sheepskin as a certificate to my seat in Congress. I am here because laboring men in my district thought I would fairly represent them and would care for their interests.

"I have worked in the shop, and when eloquent lawyers tell me that in supporting a reduction of tariff taxes upon the people I am voting to reduce wages, I say I know better. I know that there are millions of men in this country under the present system who do not get six months' steady employment out of a year.

"I know that trusts and combinations, formed to restrict production and compel high prices, shut down their shops and throw men out of employment, and that the tariff as it exists is the cause. I have never had any doubt on this subject, and the investigation of trusts by the Committee on Manufactures, of which I am a member, has fortified my conviction. Page after page of the testimony we have obtained shows that the tariff is an incentive to the formation of these trusts and combinations of capital, and has been so used for years. The combination of tariff 'protection,' as they call it, and railroad monopoly leads to trusts. The tariff and railroad monopoly may be 'wholesome' for trusts, but by them labor gets 'shelved' every time. My experience in Congress confirms my original belief in this matter every day.

"THE TARIFF BREAKS DOWN SMALL SHOPS.

"There is another matter not often spoken of in debate on this subject, but well worth the study of our people. The tariff not only creates trusts, but it also tends to create big shops and factories and to crowd out of existence smaller shops. This tendency is rapidly doing away with good mechanics, especially in the industries which they call 'protected.' In the small shop the employé becomes familiar with different branches of the work, and he is daily acquiring that knowledge which will enable him in time by industry and economy to set up in business for himself if he wishes.

"He becomes not only educated in his trade, but an educated man and a better and more independent citizen. Wherever he may move to he can find employment because he knows his whole business. He is self-reliant, intelligent, prudent, the right kind of citizen for this country. But if the same man goes into a big factory, the foreman puts him at one machine, doing only one kind of work, and he can bend over that machine until he is gray, never making any progress, and should he lose that place or move away, he is trained for no work and can do none until he finds a vacant place at the same machine in some other establishment. He is the slave of his machine. You will realize how this tariff we have now is creating big establishments at the expense of smaller ones when you look at the figures and find that against about 270,000 manufacturing establishments in 1870 we now have less than 260,000, although the number of employés has increased by a million.

"AMERICAN AND FOREIGN LABOR.

"I take up the gauntlet thrown down by Congressman W. D. KELLEY, and I declare that a Chinese wall about this country is unnatural. That nation grows richest, happiest, and most prosperous which has intercourse with its neighbors. In the Bible you will find it said that Israel was most prosperous under King Solomon, and then 'it traded with all the nations.' My experience with workingmen is that we have no such hatred against our fellow laborers in other countries as is now sought to be created and stirred up.

"We commiserate the condition of workingmen in other lands and attribute it to class legislation for the benefit of the rich and against the poor. We see the same tendency in this country, not only in the high tariff, but in railroad monopoly and other matters I have spoken of, and we should be the first and most active in preventing such legislation hereafter, and removing it where it exists. The success of the trusts in defeating a reduction of taxes now would probably lead them to make still further demands for legislation for their benefit against the country's good.

"THE POOR PAY THE TAXES.

"After all, the weight of taxation falls on the man at the plow-handle and in the shop. The first duty of legislation is to make their burdens as light as possible. If the farmer fares well all the country prospers, and more especially does labor in the cities. If the farmer is robbed labor lags and is stagnant in all the walks of life."

CONGRESSMAN SAMUEL J. HOPKINS'S VIEWS.

Congressman HOPKINS said on the subject of the tariff-reform bill:

"My support of tariff reduction and of the bill before Congress is based on the firm conviction that the tariff is a tax upon laboring men, who are the real wealth-producers of the country. Under the present tariff the wealth-producers, the men whose hard labor takes material and works it up into manufactured products, get little or no advantage, and so far as labor is concerned the word 'protection' is falsely used. Here and there the tariff as it stands may, perhaps, develop some industries, but it does not increase wages by one dollar, and any one who honestly investigates the subject, as my duty as a member of Congress has led me to do, must reach that conclusion.

"WAGES AND TRUSTS.

"The charge that the Mills bill will reduce wages is purely political buncombe on the Republican side, and is inspired by the great organizations of capital which we call trusts. I am more moderate in my belief than many, and I do not charge that the present tariff, which we wish to reform in the interests of labor, was framed for the express purpose of creating and protecting trusts. Those who framed it may have had other and good motives, but I have no hesitation in saying that the present tariff now and for several years past has encouraged and protected these trusts.

"The trusts and combinations of capital have been quick to seize the many opportunities the tariff has offered them, and they raise the false cry about lower wages to draw attention, and especially the attention of laboring men, away from themselves and their reaching out after greater gains and greater power. We all recognize that it is not the employment, wages, or welfare of American workingmen which inspires trusts. The greater and more numerous they become the less will be the opportunities for labor. What they aim at is the absolute control of American labor and of its output, and instances are abundant where they have reduced wages in order to compel their men to strike merely because they wished to limit production for the time.

"DESPOTISM OF COMBINED CAPITAL.

"The tariff as it stands is the one great incentive in our legislation to the establishment of a moneyed despotism in this country, and that is to be feared and fought against by labor more than any one thing. Such a moneyed despotism, which we already see growing up under the 'protection' of the present tariff, with its power firmly fastened on production and distribution (through railroads), and with consumption the servant of its commands is not merely worse than the military, aristocratic, or land despotism of the Old World, to escape which many workingmen have sought refuge in this country; it is as bad as or worse than chattel slavery.

"Now, I believe it is inevitable that if the Democratic party shall be stopped by these aggregations of capital in its effort to reduce taxation and to curtail the growing power of these trusts, these combinations will be emboldened to come to Congress and demand still greater privileges and will secure a still stronger grip upon the production of the country. When they tell me that there are trusts, like the Standard Oil trust, outside the 'protection' of the tariff, I acknowledge it and say that they are illegitimate results of the system.

"The tariff has tended to bring into the control of trusts, pools, and combinations all production within its scope. Following the example thus furnished, capital and industries outside the tariff combine in the same manner. In view of all these facts brought before me almost daily, the cry that the tariff pays me my wages or pays the wages of any one else I know to be worse than nonsense.

"OTHER QUESTIONS OF GOVERNMENT.

"As the tariff restricts production by putting its control in the hands of combinations of capital, so the railroads exert too strong a control over distribution. The railroad problem is of equal importance with the reduction of the tariff to laboring men and of equal importance, also, is the preservation of the public lands for actual settlers against the encroachments of land-grant railroads and of foreign capital.

"These matters all demand the earnest study of laboring men, and I regret that I can not speak now more fully upon them. I was elected on the issue of the reduction of the tariff over the Democratic nominee in a Democratic district, but the other issues to which I have barely alluded I regard of as equal importance in meeting my Congressional duties."

Congressman HOPKINS was called back to the floor of the House at this juncture by his duties and was unable to add to his words on the subjects referred to.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the consideration of the amendment?

There was no objection.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, the next paragraph of the bill, which was passed over by unanimous consent because of the absence of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCKINLEY], was the provision in reference to iron and steel cotton-ties.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Iron and steel cotton-ties or hoops for baling purposes, not thinner than No. 20 wire gauge.

Mr. SOWDEN. I send to the desk to have read an article from the American Manufacturer, of Pittsburgh, dated May 18, 1888.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no motion pending.

Mr. SOWDEN. I move to strike out that clause, and ask the Clerk to read this article.

The Clerk read as follows:

The following is from the Telegraph, of Macon, Ga. The more reckless of the Northern free-trade editors should read it carefully, and then for the remainder of their lives maintain strict silence on the subject of which it treats:

"It is well known that the most profitable feature connected with a bale of cotton is the difference in price that he buys at and the price at which he sells his cotton-ties. The price of the latter the past season averaged about $1.75 per bundle. There are forty bundles to the ton, and hence the price per ton of ties to the cotton planter was $70. This is the long ton of 2,240 pounds.

"These ties are sold at the price of cotton, and at 10 cents per pound they bring $224 per ton. As they cost only $70 per ton the net profit on every ton of ties sold by the planters of the South was $154. This shows they make a clear profit of 124 per cent., or about $4,600,000 on their annual consumption of cotton-ties. There is no class of people in the country who can better afford to see such a rate of duty levied upon cotton-ties as will enable our manufacturers to produce them at a profit."

Verily, the Telegraph talks sensibly.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, the familiar question involved in the pending item of the bill and the amendment proposed by the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SOWDEN] can not require any extended elaboration at my hands.

Within recent memory cotton was baled and bound with ropes. In the progress of other industries, as well as under the decadence of the hemp and flax industries, it was found that cotton ties could be made of iron and used at a less cost than rope, and this discovery led to their adoption.

As soon as the imports of these ties began the question arose as to the duty which the law imposed on them. Hoop-iron at that time paid a duty of 1½ cents a pound; but the Treasury Department held that as this tie was new and not specifically mentioned it came under one of the miscellaneous clauses and was allowed to enter at 35 per cent., which was a rate, of course, much less than the hoop-iron paid out of which the cotton-tie was made.

The Forty-seventh Congress, which was Republican in both branches, after an examination and discussion of the subject, placed cotton-ties by name for the first time in the tariff schedules at the rate of duty (35 per cent.) which had been fixed by the decision of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The Republican party, when charged with the responsibility of legislation, refused to raise this duty, and the consequence has been that usually all the iron ties used in the country are imported from abroad. The foreign cost of this article is about 1 cent and 2 mills per pound. The duty on hoop-iron proposed by this bill is fixed at 1.10 cents per pound. To make the duty on the ties equal to that imposed on hoop-iron would therefore increase the burden on ties to nearly 100 per cent.

I ask, are gentlemen on this side of the House prepared to make that increase? The present duty does not protect any American industry, and the revenue derived from it is unnecessary to the Government. The only sensible course for revenue reformers is to repeal this duty altogether; thus reducing the surplus and diminishing the burdens of the planters. These planters receive no benefits whatever under the existing tariff system, while the repeal will work no detriment to those who are already engaged in the thousand and one industries by which iron products are made in this country. Why, sir, the people who make this cotton to the amount of six or seven million bales annually, and who contribute to our foreign trade over $200,000,000, are not allowed, under the present law, to import into this country even the bagging and the ties with which they clothe their cotton to send it abroad.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

By unanimous consent, the time of Mr. TURNER, of Georgia, was extended for five minutes.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. These producers of cotton not only make this immense contribution to our export trade, but their cotton pays for the vast imports from which our greatest revenue is derived, and yet they can not even bring back from the markets in which they sell their product, without paying a fine to the Government, a single article that is made out of the cotton they send abroad.

The article which has just been read at the Clerk's desk at the instance of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SOWDEN] presents a fallacious argument which can be very easily refuted. The statement is that the planters buy their cotton-ties at a nominal price as compared with cotton, and are allowed, under the conditions of our trade, to sell the ties with their cotton at the price which they receive for the cotton itself. The market for our cotton is fixed by the regulations which prevail on the other side of the ocean. The Liverpool price is determined in accordance with a custom of the trade which deducts a tare of 6 per cent. from every bale. That tare is a deduction on account of the bagging and the ties. That deduction aggregates 27 pounds on every commercial bale of cotton sold on the other side of the ocean.

The buyer of cotton in New York looks at the condition of the market throughout the world, and notes the price at which cotton is quoted in Liverpool, in order that he may procure his cotton on terms which, if he is an exporter, will enable him to compete with the Liverpool price, or will enable him, if he is a manufacturer, to compete with other manufacturers at home or abroad. Under the conditions stated, certainly no sane man would buy cotton-ties and bagging at the price at which the net cotton is sold on the other side.

And the fact is that if any gentleman will take the quotations of cotton in Liverpool and compare them on any given day with those in New York, he will find that, converting American money into English pence, there is still a sufficient margin between the two prices to account for this trade regulation which exists in Liverpool. Therefore the proposition contained in the article which has been read here is a flagrant and palpable fallacy, which no man ought to repeat under the state of information which now prevails. I yield now to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR].

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on this amendment is exhausted.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. I move to strike out the last word. I have no doubt, Mr. Chairman, that the position taken by the gentleman from Georgia upon the last point stated by him is well taken. I have no idea that the fact is that cotton-ties are sold as cotton. But cotton-ties, Mr. Chairman, are nothing but hoop-iron with some little additional labor put upon them. They are cut with a slot and a button, and, aside from that, they are simply hoop-iron. By this bill it is proposed to put them on the free-list, while the hoop-iron itself is still borne on the taxable list at the rate of 1 cent per pound and 1.1 cents per pound. Now, there is no justice and no equality in that. Cotton-ties, with more labor on them but substantially the same article as hoop-iron, should not be allowed to come in free, while the hoop-iron, upon which there is less work (only a trifle less, however), is on the dutiable-list at the rate fixed in this bill. When the law was passed, which existed prior to the enactment of 1883, there was no such thing known commercially as "cotton-ties." They were then made from hoop-iron, but on there being a miscellaneous clause inserted in the law which gave the opportunity, as was supposed, the importers cut and prepared the "cotton-ties" and then asked for a ruling of the Treasury Department under that miscellaneous provision of the law and received a favorable one. So that, while hoop-iron was highly protected, "cotton-ties," which were nothing but hoop-iron, were much less protected.

In 1883, when the House of Representatives was endeavoring to pass a tariff law, an effort was made to equalize the duties; but under the circumstances then existing it was impossible to bring about the equality of these two kinds of iron which ought to have obtained. Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish some good reason might be given why cotton-ties should come in free while hoop-iron should be protected 1 cent a pound and 1.1 cents a pound. To me a good reason does not exist in the statement made by gentlemen here that in the Forty-seventh Congress the Republican party failed to correct this inequality. I admit, Mr. Chairman, that in some cases the Republican party has failed to do to the full extent what might have been done, but I do not recognize that as a good reason why a greater inequality should be made to exist. I find that our friends on the other side of the Chamber, while they continue, apparently with great earnestness, to condemn the action of the Republican party, seem perfectly content if they can find in any matter under consideration that the Republican party at one time did what they propose to do, or that some leading Republican has at some time said something in its favor. They seem to feel that that is a shield which can not be penetrated, and that they are not required to go beyond the statement that the Republican party has at some time failed to do all that Republicans said they would like to do.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish somebody to tell me what reason there is that cotton-ties should be on the free-list while hoop-iron is taxed 1 cent and a fraction per pound. It is said that the cotton-ties are all imported. They were not imported until this ruling of the Department. They were made in this country; they were made in my vicinity. Hoop-iron is made there now. The importation of cotton-ties free will injure still further that large industry, which is already crippled by the present law. I wish some reason could be given why cotton-ties should be on the free-list and hoop-iron not. The reason has not yet been given. I would like to amend this provision by putting cotton-ties upon an equality with hoop-iron and including both in the tariff schedule at 1 cent per pound.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the gentleman from Ohio will be permitted to continue his remarks for five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. In order that cotton-ties and hoop-iron may be put on an equality, how would it do to let hoop-iron come in free?

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. If I were in the position of the gentleman I would certainly say that would be the best way.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. If you will offer that proposition, we will vote for it.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. I can not support that proposition unless you can convince me that on this subject, as you claim to be the case on wool, the more tariff you take off the better the price of the domestic article.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I am afraid the gentleman would not be convinced.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. I do not think the gentleman can convince himself or any of his constituents. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. BAYNE. I renew the pro forma amendment. The inquiry of the gentleman from Ohio ought to be suggestive, it seems to me, to every Democrat representing a district outside of the cotton region of this country. How the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE] and other gentlemen from Northern districts, Democratic districts, can afford to vote in favor of making hoop-iron, when thinner than 20 wire gauge, pay a duty of 1.1 cents a pound if imported by their constituents, and can at the same time vote in favor of that identical hoop-iron going to the cotton planter of the South entirely free of duty, is a mystery to me, unless cotton is again "king," and unless the Northern Democracy is being dominated by "King Cotton," as it was before the war.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. BAYNE. Yes, sir.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I want to suggest that upon articles which, having previously been imported, are exported, the law in a great many cases allows a drawback equal to the amount of the original duty.

Mr. BAYNE. Yes, I understand that.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. Now, two-thirds of these cotton-ties are exported, and no drawback is allowed. Is not that a reason why they should come in free at the outset?

Mr. BAYNE. I think not.

The gentleman speaks of two-thirds of the cotton-ties being exported. The other third of these ties goes to the consumers at Providence, R. I., and other places, who pay at the rate of 10 cents a pound, or whatever rate may be paid for the cotton; and they get no drawback. This illustrates the effect of the Mills bill all the way through. You discriminate against the American in favor of the foreigner. You discriminate against the American manufacturer in this country when you compel him to pay that duty of 35 per cent. ad valorem; and he gets no drawback. Throughout this whole bill there is a discrimination against American interests and in favor of foreign interests.

The following proposition from the address of the Amalgamated Association of Iron and Steel Workers succintly explains the question of cotton ties:

> Third. The importation of cotton-ties, hoops, bands, and scrolls of iron and steel was in the neighborhood of 19,800 tons. This amount would have given employment to 250 men per day, at 300 days per year.
> The cotton-ties especially have given cause to considerable trouble among the men employed in mills making a specialty of cotton-ties. Because of the ad valorem rate of 35 per cent. we have almost every year to contend with a reduction in the price per ton of the imported article that caused prices to be established here from which the American manufacturer and workingman suffered alike. The Mills bill provides that cotton-ties be placed on the free-list. We positively object, as such action will deprive our workmen of the opportunity of making the limited amount of cotton-ties they now make, and in addition, it will very materially injure our hoop-iron trade. When cotton-ties were admitted under a specific duty, the unit of value was a fraction over 2 cents per pound. Since the introduction of the ad valorem rate, the unit of value has declined every year, until now it is 1.2 cents per pound.

As to the production of cotton-ties in this country there is a mill in my district that produces large quantities of them—not so large as were produced some years ago. With the 35 per cent. duty placed on cotton-ties by the present law there is a considerable manufacture in this country. The manufacturers do not want this slight protection stricken down, and it seems to me that gentlemen who represent the cotton industries and the cotton planters of the South, when they come to look at the interests represented by their colleagues and political associates from the Northern States and from the West, representing farmers who need hoop-iron to bind their hay, and for other purposes, should not make a discrimination of this sort. If there were a provision in the Constitution which forbade taxes being levied in such a way as to effect a discrimination, this would be unconstitutional; but the Supreme Court having decided that the adjustment of tariff laws with a view to protection is as much an element of those laws as the raising of revenue, this matter of discrimination must be left to the discretion of Congress. But it seems to me that gentlemen who represent these Northern States, and who vote against the farmers——

Mr. BLAND. If the farmers could take advantage of the constitutional question they would remedy a great many discriminations against them in the tariff.

Mr. BAYNE. The gentleman of silver fame [Mr. BLAND] will vote for a duty of 1.1 cents per pound upon cotton-ties which his people in the West consume in the baling of hay, and he will vote for free cotton-ties to the gentlemen who live down South. That is the way the gentleman serves his constituents.

Mr. BLAND. The gentleman would not vote for this bill if it had free ties and free hoop-iron in it.

Mr. BAYNE. I would not take an unfair advantage of any class of the people. I would not give to one class and withhold from another an advantage at the behest of the majority of a party, in the control of which king cotton is again asserting himself and again making Northern "doughfaces." You will find the coming fall when the vote is taken the people of the West will remember these things. They are going to say that the South shall not again sit in the saddle and dominate the Northern States and control legislation in the interest of the South as against the North.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Let the gentleman from Pennsylvania be candid and frank for one moment. Let him answer the question plainly which I put to him.

Mr. BAYNE. What is your question?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Is the gentleman willing to vote to put upon the free-list hoop-iron used as binders in baling the hay raised by the farmers of the country?

Mr. BAYNE. No; I am not.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I did not suppose you were. It is therefore a mere pretext on the part of the gentleman in what he says to prejudice this bill.

Mr. BAYNE. Why did you not offer an amendment to accomplish that purpose and not take my time with any such question?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. This illustrates the position of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. In his district there is a manufactory of hoop-iron and cotton-ties, and he wants to impose a tax on every farmer in the South and West. In behalf of that manufactory he wants to keep up a high tariff on cotton-ties and hoop-iron for baling hay to benefit the men in his district who are engaged in that business. That is the kind of legislation Republicans are trying to force on the country in behalf of the protected classes. That legislation is against the interest of the many and in the interest of the few. It is in the interest of monopolies. The gentlemen on the other side of the House desire to keep up these monopolies and to tax the farmers of the South and throughout the country upon cotton-ties and hoop-iron which they use in baling their cotton, hay, and other products. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BAYNE. Let me ask the gentleman from Illinois a question?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. When I put the question to the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether he was willing, in the interest of his own farmers, to give them hoop-iron free of duty in order to bind their hay, he tells me flatly and plainly he will not. He protects the men engaged in the manufacture of hoop-iron in his district as it does those who manufacture cotton-ties, and he does it against the men who earn their bread by the sweat of their brow. [Applause.]

Mr. BAYNE. Why did not the gentleman offer a proposition proposing an amendment to the bill preventing a discrimination against those farmers of his district who use hoop-iron? Why did he allow his constituents to be discriminated against in that regard? That is, that those who consume this hoop-iron in baling their products to pay 1.1 cents higher duty than on cotton-ties?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. This bill was not prepared in a caucus where it could be amended.

Mr. BAYNE. Why did not you offer an amendment to do away with that unjust discrimination in the bill in favor of the cotton-ties of the South and against the hoop-iron used by your constituents?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. In the Forty-seventh Congress a bill was prepared by a Republican Congress of this House and brought in here and forced upon them. That bill was fashioned and framed in a Republican caucus by the leader of the Republican party of this House—Judge KELLEY. This bill was not prepared in a Democratic caucus. It was prepared in the committee in the service of the House and organized to prepare this bill. It was prepared in the Committee on Ways and Means, and I had no such opportunity to amend that the gentlemen on the other side had in the bill prepared by the Republican caucus. I had no such opportunity as the gentleman from Pennsylvania had and the Republicans on the other side of the House in the Forty-seventh Congress. That bill then reported to the Republican House presented mere Republican caucus action, and it was put through at that time under the whip and spur, under the lash of caucus demand and dictation. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. Now answer the question of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. BAYNE. In addition to the proposition of the Amalgamated Association of Iron and Steel Workers, I wish to incorporate as a part of my remarks the following, published in the Philadelphia Press from the London Times:

FOR FREE TRADE IN FACT AND THEORY—THE LEADING NEWSPAPER OF GREAT BRITAIN EXPRESSES THE UNANIMOUS ENGLISH OPINION OF CLEVELAND.

[Editorial in London Times of July 6, 1888.]

Though the President's celebrated message to Congress showed his intentions beyond the possibility of mistake, the St. Louis convention, it will be remembered, did not bring tariff reform very prominently forward. It was thought to be delicate ground, and the managers had hopes that the Democratic platform might still attract some protectionists. But when the Republicans met at Chicago it soon became plain that the battle was mainly to be fought on the protectionist issue. * * * In this way President Cleveland was forced to take up in a still more decided way his old position, and his Tammany Hall letter is the most definite statement that he has yet made of his reforming views. His language is extremely strong, and to many it can hardly fail to be convincing. * * * It would hardly be possible to put the free-trade case more clearly or more strongly; and yet—such is the force of words—President Cleveland shrinks from the use of the term "free trade." In fact, he declares that those who taunt him with being a free-trader are deceiving the country. "Free-trader" appears to be equivalent, in the language of American political controversy, to "enemy of workingmen and industrial enterprises." * * * It is certain that the arguments which President Cleveland urges are those which Cobden used to employ forty-five years ago, and which any English free-trader would employ now.

The CHAIRMAN. The formal amendments will be considered as withdrawn, and the question recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SOWDEN].

Mr. WARNER. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TURNER] in his first five minutes made a statement, the substance of which was that the cotton planters of the South had added largely to our exports and thereby enhanced the prosperity of our country. To that proposition I fully consent. Coupled with that statement was the complaint that the cotton planters were not permitted to import into this country the bagging for the covering of their cotton or the ties for binding their cotton without paying a duty.

Mr. Chairman, my only purpose in saying a word now is to emphasize what I said the other day on the question of bagging for covering cotton, and to couple it with the remark of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TURNER] "that the duty should not be placed on cotton-ties, because we do not need the revenue which would be collected therefrom." I think I have stated the gentleman's position correctly.

I find no fault with the gentleman for advocating and getting the most favorable legislation he possibly can for every industry in his district or section of the country. But when I reflect that a few days since bagging for covering cotton, an industry greatly affecting the city of St. Louis, which manufactures one-half of the bagging for covering the cotton used in the United States, and when it is further admitted on this floor that the Southern planter gets that bagging cheaper than he ever got it before, and when it is still further admitted not one pound of that bagging is imported into the United States and that we are not collecting one cent of duty on it, I am filled with wonder that the Representatives of my State, unlike the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TURNER], remain silent and see that industry stricken down, and open our markets to the product of the foreign mill—of the foreign labor in Dundee and Calcutta—not for the purpose of reducing the surplus, but to put $375,000 customs duties into the Treasury each year at the cost of the destruction of an industry of my State. This action can only be justified on the ground of free trade.

I say I honor the gentleman for advocating the industries of his own State, and I would that gentlemen representing industries in other districts that are stricken down by the provisions of this bill, instead of being in a combine for taking the duty off of everything, would stand by their interest.

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman yield for an inquiry?

Mr. WARNER. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLAND. Where do the farmers of Missouri get a market for their mules, their horses, their meat product, and all other products? Are they not dependent largely upon the cotton-fields of the South? Yet the gentleman would strike down the farmers of Missouri in his attempt to strike down the cotton-raisers of the South.

Mr. WARNER. The gentleman asked a question and made a speech in which he placed me in a position I do not occupy. That the gentleman felt uneasy under my remarks, I do not wonder. I do not wonder at all that the Representatives of Missouri should feel uneasy when they have sat here in their seats and never uttered a protest, save in a private caucus, if at all, against any of the measures of this bill affecting her interest. I repeat, I do not wonder that the gentleman should feel uneasy when he stated on the floor of this House that he was in a "combine"—a combine for what purpose? To take the duty off of everything that he could. This is free trade to the fullest extent of the term. The gentleman may defend free trade in his district, but let me say to him that there are districts in Missouri where that doctrine will not do. His "combine," as he stated its purpose, is to take the duty off of lead, and to take the duty off of everything; that is the gentleman's position. "Where do we find a market for our mules, our horses, and our meat products?" he asks me. Does the gentleman assume by his question that we will sell one mule less, or one horse less, or one pound of our meat product less to the South if ties for cotton shall be taxed 35 per cent. ad valorem, or cotton-bagging 3 cents a yard, when it is sold to them cheaper than it ever was before? Does the gentleman assume that? Has he no regard for the industries of Missouri?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be permitted to occupy three minutes more time.

Mr. WARNER. I shall not consume further time of the committee.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, in regard to the question of making cotton-ties it may be well for gentlemen to bear in mind that it is not in fact an established industry in this country. If gentlemen will look at the record on this subject they will find that the cotton-tie industry can hardly be said to have existed since 1882, and it did not amount to much in 1879. By the census of 1880 there were one hundred and thirty-one people employed distinctively in making cotton-ties.

The duty upon the one hand and the subsidy upon the other, by the time they were paid by the consumer, amount to a tax of about 10 cents a bale on cotton. I say that there were one hundred and thirty-one people engaged separately and distinctively in this employment, and in that are included the workmen, large and small. But a tax of 10 cents a bale on the cotton was at that time a tax of $400,000 or $560,000, and at this time would be a tax of $600,000 or $700,000 upon the people for the purpose of maintaining the wages of, as far as the census show, only one hundred and thirty-one people.

But there has been a marked change in the industry since then. Our imports in 1882 were but little over $20,000 worth of this article. The bill of 1883 changed the status of cotton-ties, and our imports immediately jumped to $723,000 worth, and the next year to $822,000 worth, having jumped from 1,080,000 pounds to 42,000,000 and 49,000,000 pounds of this commodity, respectively, in the years mentioned. That has been substantially the state of the industry ever since the tariff bill of 1883 went into effect.

Now, sir, gentlemen say if we put cotton-ties on the free-list why not put band-iron on the free-list? But the condition of band-iron is exactly the reverse of cotton-ties. If gentlemen will look at the imports of hoop and band iron they will find them but nominal in amount, and while I do not read the figures in the various descriptions of band-iron, an article used to an enormous extent in this country, the imports amounted to but a few thousand dollars, being practically nominal; and of the description corresponding to these ties, thinner than No. 20 wire gauge, the imports in 1886 were exactly $1 in value, and in 1887 there were no imports at all. The use of this is doubtless large, the imports none, and hence labor is now employed in making it. It is an existing industry.

But, sir, there is another marked difference in addition to this one between these industries. There is a marked difference in addition to the fact that one industry exists and the other does not, and that difference is found in the fact that the use of band-iron is permanent, while the use of cotton-ties is but a temporary use. The only permanent feature about the use of cotton-ties is that it is a recurring waste and loss. Every year it is a dead loss, and we can get no drawbacks, even for imported ties.

In my country we know this practically. In shipping cotton to New Orleans, New York, or Liverpool the net returns are practically the same on a bale of cotton. If the cotton be sold in New Orleans or New York it is sold at the gross weight, while if sold in Liverpool it is sold at the net weight; and a 500-pound bale of cotton sold in New Orleans at 10 cents a pound will bring $50, while if sold in Liverpool, and sold at the net weight, which would be 476 pounds, it still brings $50. Every dollar paid, therefore, for the bagging and ties is stricken off as tare from the bale, and the tare is so returned in the account of sale if sold abroad, and goes to the debit of profit and loss. If sold in this country it is deducted in fixing the gross price.

The people get nothing for it whatever. Therefore those who seek the interests of the people should seek carefully so large an element of waste as this; and it is calculated to attract the attention of gentlemen when they realize that this is an article that has no industrial interest in this country except at the cost of all classes.

But gentlemen say it is sectional. But what of that if it be just? If gentlemen will take the time to look at the two sections of the country they might make a comparison which would be profitable. There is the article of tin-plate, of which we import sixteen to seventeen millions a year, and upon which we pay over $5,000,000 revenue, used to a large extent for canning purposes in the enormous industry which has grown up in this country and which might well be placed upon the free-list on the same basis as cotton-ties. These great industries are nearly all in the North.

Do we not remove this great tax and waste from these Northern industries? One may fairly be said to offset the other. If we repeal $121,000 of revenue from cotton-ties, and never, of course, counting the subsidy, and especially up to the time it reaches the consumer, for the South, if you please, to almost the entire extent it may be said that we repeal almost in equal degree over $5,000,000 of the revenue from tin-plate for the North, This does not estimate what it is by the time the consumer gets it and pays for it. This looks to me to be very fair and liberal, yet gentlemen ignore facts of this kind and charge that a matter of this sort is sectional in its character. They still pursue the policy which they have uniformly pursued down to this time; they do not go to the bottom facts and seek to demonstrate their proposition. It is all declamation and assertion in the very teeth of the facts as set forth in the bill and in the official reports.

I now wish to call attention to the class of people upon whom this needless burden mainly falls.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, I desire that we shall get through with this bill to-day, and I therefore move that the committee now rise for the purpose of limiting debate.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that they had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. MILLS. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House bill 9051; and, pending that, I move that all debate on the pending paragraph and the amendments thereto be limited to ten minutes, five minutes on each side; and upon that I demand the previous question.

Mr. BURROWS. I hope the gentleman will not do that.

Mr. BUCHANAN. If you do that you will require to have a quorum.

Mr. MCKINLEY. I suggest to the gentleman from Texas that debate be not limited to ten minutes.

Mr. MILLS. I will withdraw the demand for the previous question.

Mr. MCKINLEY. I do not know how many gentlemen desire to speak upon this question, but it seems to me that to insist upon closing the debate in ten minutes is not, at this stage of proceeding, exactly a fair thing. I want to speak three or four minutes at some time during the debate, and there are doubtless other gentlemen on this side of the House who wish to speak. I suggest, therefore, that the time be fixed at thirty minutes, fifteen minutes on each side, if that is agreeable to my friends on this side of the House.

Mr. MILLS. I will accept that suggestion; but I want to say to my friend from Ohio [Mr. MCKINLEY], whom I am glad to see back in his seat again, that I have been urged by gentlemen on both sides to hurry this bill up and try to get through with it, and that it is in response to those appeals from gentlemen on both sides that I am trying to have it finished to-day.

Mr. MCKINLEY. Well, if my colleagues on this side are satisfied to have the debate close in ten minutes, I am.

Mr. MILLS. No, we will give you thirty minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas modifies his motion, and moves that debate on the pending paragraph and all amendments thereto be closed in thirty minutes, fifteen minutes to be allowed to each side.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Say twenty minutes on either side. There are several gentlemen here who want to speak.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] to limit the debate to thirty minutes, upon which he demands the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS], to limit debate upon the paragraph under consideration and on all amendments thereto to thirty minutes, the understanding being that the time shall be divided equally between the two sides of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MILLS. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of bills raising revenue.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. All debate on the pending paragraph and amendments thereto has been limited to thirty minutes. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TURNER] will be recognized to control the time on one side, and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR] on the other.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WARNER], who addressed the House awhile ago, propounded to me certain questions which I desire to answer in the brief time allowed me. While the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] had the floor I endeavored to show that on articles which pay a duty on being imported the law allows a drawback to the amount of the duty when they are exported.

This drawback is not allowed in the case of cotton-ties or bagging, although two-thirds of these articles are exported. This disposes, of course, of the argument as to two-thirds of the cotton-ties. Now, upon cotton bagging, by this bill a duty of three-eighths of 1 cent, which is equivalent to 15 per cent. ad valorem, is retained, which will represent a sum much larger than the revenue derived for the ties which are not exported. When it is considered that there is allowed to the planter no drawback when the bagging is exported on the cotton it will be found, looking over the whole field, that the farmers of this country who produce cotton should at least have these ties free. This arrangement is simply a substitute for the drawback which other industries receive—besides, the ties are a dead loss to the planter, whether his cotton is sold at home or abroad.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WARNER] asked how I could justify the vote which I gave the other day to reduce cotton bagging to a specific duty equivalent to 15 per cent. In reply, allow me to say that during the Forty-eighth Congress, when this subject was under consideration by the able Committee on Ways and Means as then organized, a gentleman from New York, Mr. William Marshall, who was the pioneer in this industry, and who introduced into this country and manufactured the first jute butts ever imported, declared, in answer to a question of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCKINLEY], who was then cross-examining him, that a duty of 15 per cent. on bagging was sufficient protection if he could be allowed jute free; and that this bill allows.

I now yield two minutes to my colleague [Mr. STEWART].

Mr. STEWART, of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, in the few minutes of time allotted me I will not be able to do justice to the subject under consideration.

By the provisions of the Mills bill hoop-iron, used as cotton-ties, has been placed upon the free-list. A motion has been made (coming from the Republican side of the House) to take cotton-ties from the free-list and place upon them a heavy duty. The distinct point to which I wish to call the attention of the House is this: From the close of the war down to this very hour the Republican party has made all kinds of professions of sympathy and friendship for the colored people. Through the public press, in the legislative halls, and upon the rostrum the Republican party has declared that they were the true friends of the colored people, and, Mr. Chairman, I rejoice to-day that we are confronted with a proposition which will test the sincerity of the Republican party; for, sir, it will be remembered that of the 6,000,000 bales of cotton produced in the South, one-half if not two-thirds of the labor engaged in this industry is contributed by the colored people. Under our system of growing cotton, as a general rule, the white people furnish the land and stock and the colored people furnish the labor. The cotton when prepared for market is subject to a deduction of the amount necessary to pay for the bagging and ties.

The duty on cotton-ties amounts to several hundred thousands of dollars and is a burden, borne in a large measure by the labor and toil of the colored people. I desire here upon this floor to serve notice upon the Republican party, as represented in this House, that if they vote to impose this tax upon the colored people we will see to it that they shall be made acquainted with your conduct touching this matter.

Now, gentlemen, if you are the friends of the laboring man, as you profess to be, here is an opportunity to get in your work. If your twenty-five years of professions of kindness toward the colored people is sincere, the present occasion is a fit time to demonstrate your fidelity. The colored people are not so ignorant as you might suppose, and if you deceive them they will find it out.

When an opportunity to lift a burden from their shoulders is so clearly presented how can you be consistent and vote to place a heavy duty on cotton-ties and thereby take from the hard earnings of every poor colored man who makes a bale of cotton a sum of money which should go to the support of the colored man and his family? The issue is clearly made, and you may feel assured that the colored man has sufficient information to determine who his true friends are; and if the Republican party shall to-day demonstrate that they prefer a high protective tariff rather than the good of the colored people, how can you expect them longer to affiliate with your party.

While the duty on cotton-ties will be a source of profit to a few favored industries which have grown rich under the system of high protective tariff, is it not true on the other hand if we place cotton-ties on the free-list we will have the satisfaction of knowing that we have to some extent lightened the burden which has been imposed upon the farmers of this country—a class among all the people of the United States that have received less benefit at the hands of the Government.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Mr. Chairman, representing as I do a large agricultural district, on behalf of the farmers I desire to protest against this unjust discrimination against them and against their interests. While cotton-ties are placed on the free-list the hoop-iron used in making wash-tubs, meat-tubs, lard-tubs, butter-tubs, horse-buckets, etc., is retained on the dutiable-list. The iron hoops used on oil barrels, cider barrels, rain barrels, and everything of this kind are made to pay a duty, while cotton-ties are placed upon the free-list. Water-tanks, so largely used in manufacturing and in many other forms of industry, are made with strap-iron hoops, which are retained on the dutiable-list, while the iron hoops that go around a bale of cotton are made free by this bill. It is admitted that the cotton-planter buys this strap-iron at a little over 2 cents a pound and sells it with his cotton at the price of cotton, 8 or 10 cents per pound, no deduction ever being made for the strap-iron around the bale called cotton-ties, and yet cotton-ties are placed on the free-list, while all the strap-iron used by the farmer and manufacturer is made to pay a duty. This is as unjust as it is sectional.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Will my colleague vote to put these things on the free-list with me? I will vote to do so.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I will not vote to put the product of any American labor on the free-list, I do not care whether it is in my district or the district of any other gentleman on this floor.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND], who is so eager to put his questions, can not deceive the intelligent constituents in his district when he says that he considers the protective policy, which we insist protects American labor and American manufacturers, is in the interest of the few and in opposition to the welfare of the many. The cotton-planters of the South in this case are the many in his judgment and the people of the North are the few. The latter have some rights and should be protected in a measure of this kind.

I wish the farmers of the country to understand this unjust discrimination made against them and in favor of cotton-ties. It is unfair, it is unjust, it is palpably wrong.

It is a discrimination against the people of my district as well as against the entire North and against all farmers who are not cotton-planters. Farmers and manufacturers use large quantities of strap-iron, and it is used largely in the manufacture of agricultural tools and implements, and I see no reason why strap-iron should be free for one purpose and not free for another.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Let me ask my colleague whether he is not interested in the stock of one of the manufactories of hoop-iron?

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. What of it? [Great laughter and applause.] I will say to the gentleman that I am not. Let me ask the gentleman whether he was serving his constituency or his country as a Representative on this floor when he was spending two months of his time out in his district securing his renomination? [Laughter and applause.] Do you propose to draw your salary when you were absent from your seat in this House during all that time? [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. REED. You ought not to complain of his being at home. [Laughter.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The men who use butter-tubs and who use hoop-iron for other purposes understand this matter perfectly. They know that they have to pay a tribute to the manufacturers of hoop-iron.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. The farmers know their friends and who are for them and who are against them, and they will vote accordingly at the election next November.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I had occasion the other day to correct a statement in regard to the Forty-seventh Congress, and I propose now to correct another.

Both of these statements were made on the other side of this House. The last statement, the one made only a few minutes since, was that a tariff bill was framed by a Republican caucus of the Forty-seventh Congress. This is not true. The tariff bill of the Forty-seventh Congress was never considered by a Republican caucus or any other caucus. I undertake to say that no line or word of the tariff act of 1883, or of any other tariff act or bill, was framed or modified or changed or considered by a Republican caucus of the Forty-seventh Congress. Nothing of the kind was done in the Forty-seventh Congress. A caucus, or some sort of an informal meeting, was held for some purpose after the bill had been completed by the committee, at which there was some talk in regard to the consideration of the bill, but nothing was done; no change in the bill was made, nor was any proposed; no vote was taken on any matter; and this was the only meeting of the Republican members after or while the bill was being prepared.

The preparation of a tariff bill by a political caucus is the invention of the Democratic party. This bill, known as the Mills bill, was prepared by a Democratic caucus before it ever came before this House or the Ways and Means Committee, and while the bill has been changed to accomplish certain political ends, doubtless to secure the necessary number of votes to carry it through this House, no motion to amend made by any Republican has ever prevailed. This bill is the product of a Democratic caucus, where no hearing was given to any industry, where no member was acting under oath, and where the welfare and prosperity of sixty millions of people were made subservient only to party ends and party purposes. [Applause on the Republican side.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. McKINLEY. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAVIS].

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I wish simply to emphasize the fact that American manufacturers pay for the cotton-ties and bagging, as well as for the cotton, and to state further it is extremely improbable as a practical proposition that the price is returned to them. I shall be willing to admit that if all other things were equal for a long period of time, it is probable that at last the manufacturer would be able to deduct this and purchase his cotton at the same rate as the Englishman pays. Every one practically acquainted with the business knows this has been regarded always as a grievance by the manufacturer in this country. He pays 8 and 10 cents for cotton-ties, and in England the Englishman pays nothing for them.

Attempts have been made to remove what is regarded as a great grievance, but without success. The Southern planter, even if he makes nothing out of it, as the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TURNER] asserts, is reluctant to give up the opportunity of being paid for his cotton-ties and cotton-bagging. I think it will be admitted that in all cases where gross prices are paid the advantage is always against the purchaser. Varying conditions independent of this one fact affect the price of cotton here as compared with the price abroad, and will prevent the American purchaser securing the result claimed by the gentleman from Georgia. That can only be secured by purchasing the cotton net, as is the practice in Great Britain.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I ask the gentleman from Ohio to finish the debate on his side. There are eight minutes remaining on this, I believe.

Mr. McKINLEY. Mr. Chairman, the language under discussion is found in lines 120 and 121 of the bill, and reads:

Iron and steel cotton-ties or hoops for baling purposes, not thinner than No. 20 wire gauge—and such are declared under the provisions of this bill to be admitted free of duty.

I turn to page 17 of the bill and I find that hoop-iron of exactly the same gauge (and I refer to line 211) as described in line 120 is made dutiable at 1.1 cents a pound. Now, of all the indefensible features of this bill there is none, in my judgment, so indefensible as the one under consideration. In the remainder of the free-list—in the free-list generally—that which is made free is made free to everybody and for every purpose. While I am opposed to this entire free-list, yet with the exception I have named, that of cotton-ties, it falls equally upon every citizen and upon every section of the country. Salt is made free. It is not free simply to the Northern people, but to the Southern people as well. It is not free for one industry that uses salt, but it is free to all. Lumber is made free, and it is free alike to every citizen and to every section of the country. It is made free to all of our people. But when you come to hoop-iron not less than No. 20 wire gauge, then its freedom is limited, and it is limited to certain producers and sections of the United States. For every other purpose it is made dutiable at 1.1 cents a pound. So I say here that of all the indefensible features of this bill it is the most indefensible that can be found in it.

Now, if I was a Democrat, if I was a revenue tariff reformer, if I was a free-trader, and I proposed to have hoop-iron of a gauge not less than No. 20 made free for any purpose, I would make it free for all purposes. I would make it free to the balers of hay and I would make it free for every other purpose and in every other industry to which it can be applied, and not free for only one part of the citizens or for one class of people. I am opposed—for I anticipate the question that my friend from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE] will put to me—to free hoop-iron for any purpose, because the duty we put on it in the past has made it cheaper to the consumers of the country than it would have been possible if we had free trade in hoop-iron.

And so I move you, Mr. Chairman, without detaining the committee a single moment longer, that cotton-ties not thinner than No. 20 wire gauge shall be transferred from the free-list to page 17 and put into line 211, and made dutiable at precisely the same rate of duty as every other class of hoop-iron is made dutiable.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Would it be proper to move an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio that hoop-iron thinner than No. 10 wire gauge and not thinner than No. 20 wire gauge be put on the free-list?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that would be in order.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Then I make the motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will entertain the motion at the proper time.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I mean to make it correspond to the provision of the bill in reference to cotton-ties.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. Has the gentleman from Ohio exhausted his time?

Mr. MCKINLEY. I have no desire to occupy any further time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has one minute remaining.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I understood the gentleman from Ohio to say that the duty on hoop and band iron, as it has existed, has made that material cheaper than it ever was before to the consumers of the country?

Mr. MCKINLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Then I understand him to argue that free trade in cotton-ties will increase the cost of the cotton-ties?

Mr. MCKINLEY. No, sir; not at all.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Does not that follow as a necessary and logical sequence from the gentleman's argument?

Mr. MCKINLEY. By no means. That is not the logic of my argument.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Then what is?

Mr. MCKINLEY. If it were not for the duty on plain hoop-iron to-day you would pay much more for cotton-ties in the South than you do. It is because every other class of hoop-iron for every other purpose is made dutiable that you get the advantage of the low prices; and the greater advantage you will get when ties are made free.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Then let me put the question to the gentleman in this form: Suppose you put the duty you propose on cotton-ties, will that also make them cheaper than they are now?

Mr. MCKINLEY. The duty on cotton-ties?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Yes, sir.

Mr. MCKINLEY. In my judgment, if a duty on cotton-ties is made the same as on hoop-iron, we will have them cheaper to the Southern people in less than two years than you have them to-day.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Very well. If free trade will make it higher, how can that hurt the manufacturer here?

Mr. MCKINLEY. Oh, that is the old question.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Of course; and yours is the old proposition, but you have never attempted to demonstrate how it can consist.

Mr. MCKINLEY. But I am glad that the gentleman admits that he is a free-trader and that his party is a free-trade party, for I have discovered that in the last few weeks they have been endeavoring to evade that issue.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. The gentleman's definition of free trade and mine are perhaps two different definitions, but I am unable to see how he can argue that the increase in price will hurt the manufacturer in this country.

Mr. REED. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] never takes any opportunity to deny that he is a free-trader, and he has had plenty of them.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. MCSHANE] is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. MCSHANE. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out, in line 120, the words "cotton-ties or," and the words "for baling purposes;" so that the paragraph will read: "iron and steel hoops not thinner than No. 20 wire gauge."

Mr. MCSHANE. I am in favor of admitting hoop-iron of the class mentioned in this paragraph free of duty, provided that when admitted it may be used for any purpose whatever. The amendment that I offer will accomplish that object and admit iron and steel hoops not thinner than No. 20 wire gauge free of duty and will allow the same to be used for whatever purpose parties may choose to use them.

Mr. BAYNE. I suggest to the gentleman that he will not fully accomplish his purpose by his amendment, because they use more wire than hoop-iron for baling.

Mr. MCSHANE. I want them to have the privilege of using hoop-iron if they see fit, and I merely want to say now, because I do not wish to take up the time of the House, that upon a failure to allow this hoop-iron to be used for any purpose for which people desire to use it, I shall vote to strike out from this bill the paragraph under consideration, thus leaving the duty as it exists under the present law.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER].

[Mr. WHEELER withholds his remarks for revision. See APPENDIX.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TURNER] has four minutes remaining.

Mr. TURNER. I yield that time to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND].

Mr. BLAND. I am obliged to the gentleman from Georgia, but I desire the floor only for a few minutes for the purpose of replying briefly to my colleague, Mr. WARNER, who saw proper to comment somewhat upon a few remarks which I made a short time ago upon this bill, when I claimed, as I do now, that I am not an agent or attorney upon this floor for any particular industry or interest.

As I said before, I am willing to vote for this bill, or for any other fair bill, even if it puts things that are made in my district upon the free-list. And for what reason? Because, as we sit here we are reminded, as we have been for years in the past, that the tax-payers of this country, the farmers of this country, the cotton-growers, the wheat-growers, the meat-growers of this country, who produce the whole of the commodities that we export, are taxed and fined at the rate of $200,000,000 a year simply because they are unable to obtain a home market for what they produce, and these taxes and fines are being laid up in the Federal Treasury, and as a result the property of the people is reduced in value, the money is taken from circulation, and in many instances it is wasted here upon improvident appropriations. It is for their relief that I stand here, and not for the relief that is pleaded for, especially by my colleague and others on that side of the House, who come here representing simply the industrial interests in their own districts and ready to vote for them at the expense of the great mass of the people of this country.

Mr. WARNER. I will ask my colleague whether either of the industrial interests of which I have spoken, either the bagging industry or the lead industry, is in my district?

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman undertook to arraign the Democratic party because it was in favor of, to some extent, relieving the farmers of the South——

Mr. WARNER. No, because it was in favor of free trade.

Mr. BLAND. And when I asked him what would become of the farmers of Missouri whose market for their cattle and their mules and their breadstuffs is found to a considerable extent in the cotton-fields of the South, he was unable to answer that question, but he undertook to arraign me here for a speech that I had made in the interest of the masses of the American people and against the special interests which are the object of so much tender care on the other side of the House.

Mr. WARNER. Did not the gentleman state, and does he not hold to-day, that he is here for the purpose of voting to take the duty off every article that he can? Did he not state that he was in a "combine" for that purpose?

Mr. BLAND. I have made no such statement. I said I was here for the purpose of organizing a "combine," if necessary, to reduce the surplus to the needs of the Government, and for that reason I was willing to sacrifice any personal interest, and stand, not as a representative of classes and monopolies, but as a representative of an overtaxed and overburdened people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The first question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. MCSHANE], which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, in line 120, the words "cotton-ties or," and also the words "for baling purposes;" so that the paragraph will read: "Iron and steel hoops not thinner than No. 20 wire gauge."

The amendment was agreed to; there being—ayes 80, noes 71.

The question recurred on the following amendment, offered by Mr. SOWDEN:

Strike out lines 120 and 121.

Mr. MCKINLEY. This question is on striking out the lines as amended.

The CHAIRMAN. That must be the form of the question. The Clerk will read the paragraph as it now stands since the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Iron and steel hoops not thinner than No. 20 wire gauge.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on striking out these words.

Mr. BYNUM. What is the effect of the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio did not offer an amendment.

Mr. BYNUM. What became of the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE]?

The CHAIRMAN. It was not offered.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I intended to have it considered as pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman proposed to offer an amendment, but at the time he stated his proposition it was not in order.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. SOWDEN, there were—ayes 92, noes 96.

Mr. SOWDEN called for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read the following paragraphs:

Cement, Roman, Portland, and all other, 10 per cent. ad valorem.
Whiting and Paris white, 20 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. MILLS. I move to strike out those lines.

Mr. MCCOMAS. I make the point of order that there is now an amendment pending to those lines.

Mr. MILLS. These lines were passed over. I had them passed over.

Mr. MCCOMAS. The gentleman has forgotten there is now an amendment pending.

Mr. MILLS. No; I have offered the first amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was endeavoring to ascertain whether any amendment was already pending.

Mr. McCOMAS. On July 1, as will be found by reference to the RECORD, an amendment was offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SOWDEN].

Mr. MILLS. It was not recognized.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will ascertain the status of this matter.

Mr. MILLS. The member who has charge of a bill in the House is entitled first to be recognized; the Chair always observes that rule; and though a gentleman may rise in his place and say he offers his amendment and get his name in the RECORD, yet he may not be recognized by the Chair for that purpose.

Mr. McCOMAS. My point is that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] got his name in the RECORD in the wrong way; that on July 1 the gentleman from Pennsylvania was recognized to move an amendment which has now been pending for eighteen days. Although the gentleman from Texas may have charge of this matter, he must remember the rules of procedure.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the status of this matter when passed over.

The Clerk read as follows:

It is proposed by Mr. SOWDEN to amend lines 16 and 17 by striking out, in those lines, "10 per cent. ad valorem" and inserting "10 cents per 100 pounds."

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment just read is the amendment pending. The proposition of the gentleman from Texas is in order.

Mr. SOWDEN. At the time this question was passed over informally the amendment just read had been offered by myself and was pending. In support of it I send to the Clerk's desk a letter which I desire to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEIGFRIED'S BRIDGE, July 16, 1888.

DEAR SIR: Allow us to give you some facts relating to the cement business and the way the people who work in the industry abroad live. Professor Henry Reid, in his work entitled "Natural and Artificial Concrete," on page 305, says that the works of the Star Portland Cement Factory at Stettin, in Pomerania, is a model one. In 1878 heir annual product was 240,000 casks, equivalent in quantity to 300,000 barrels of American Rosendale cement.

If we turn to volume 1 of the Consular Reports, entitled "Labor in Europe," on page 512 we will find that the average wages paid in a Portland cement manufactory in Stettin, and it is presumably this one, was $3.57 per week of sixty hours, equal to 59½ cents per day of ten hours.

Consul Keifer, of Stettin, in his report to the Department of State in July, 1884, in speaking of the condition of the working people in and around Stettin, where these works are, says:

"The working people either live in cellars or in upper rooms, often in yards; mostly in old buildings without water, sewerage, or ventilation. New buildings, tenement houses, are better provided for in this regard, but there are only a limited number. The men often have to walk five to eight English miles every morning in order to get to work."

The same report says that the men live on coffee, mostly a decoction of chicory or roasted barley, rye bread with lard or goose grease, they seldom have a piece of cheap sausage, and a drink of cheap whisky distilled from potatoes, comprise a meal. At certain times fishes are cheap and form part of the meal.

The consul further says:

Butter, sirup, meat, tea, etc., the daily fare of our American laborer, are regarded as luxuries. Once, or in better situated families, twice a week, a pound of cheap meat must do for four or five persons; the husband mostly enjoying the taste of it, the rest of the family only the smell. When the consul asked one of these laboring men how he got along, he smiled gloomily and said: "I must get along with it or steal."

The total amount of cement that has been imported into this country for the past ten years would be equal in quantity to 5,366,775 barrels of American cement of 300 pounds each. If American cement had been used and the foreign article excluded by a suitable tariff, it would have employed 670 additional men working 200 days a year for ten years to have produced that amount. There would have been paid out to them at the lowest calculation, $2,144,000 for labor alone, and it would have required $912,351.75 worth of cooperage, which would have come from Maine and Michigan, to have barreled it, to say nothing of the $328,006, that would have been paid to coopers to make the barrels, or the 53,622 reams of paper, worth $32,197, that would have been necessary to line them with. At least 7,328 kegs of nails, worth $23,912, would have been used to cooper the barrels, while it would have required 825 barrels of paste, worth $1,650, simply to have affixed the labels to the barrels.

The importations of foreign cement have increased at the rate of 34 per cent. for the last ten years, and for the last fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, the importations increased 64 per cent. over the previous year, while the invoiced price of the foreign article has declined on an average of 12 per cent. a year.

Enough mill capacity now exists to supply all demands, but to-day some mills are closed and others are running on reduced time. The reports of the engineering committee of the District of Columbia for 1885 contain evidence to prove that just as good cement can be made in this country as abroad, but when labor is on an average over twice here what it is abroad, and in some cases six and eight times as much, and as labor constitutes 87 per cent. of the cost of a barrel of cement, the industry should certainly be protected by an adequate duty.

Very respectfully,

ROCK LOCK ROSENDALE CEMENT COMPANY.

Hon. W. H. SOWDEN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. SOWDEN. The amendment just submitted by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] will, if adopted, leave the present duty on cement undisturbed, and accomplished substantially the purposes of my amendment. There is very little difference between a duty on cement of 20 per cent. ad valorem and one of 10 cents per hundred pounds, excepting that a specific duty is more preferable than an ad valorem duty on account of undervaluations.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as the subsidy amendment to the Post-Office appropriation bill has been eliminated by the agreement of the Senate to the position of the House on that subject, inasmuch as that question is not likely to come up again, and inasmuch as since that time I have been put in the possession of some very valuable testimony, I ask to have it read in my time for the benefit of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

BALTIMORE, July 14, 1888.

DEAR SIR: We have noticed with much interest your opposition in the House yesterday to the proposal for a subsidy to a line of steamers to Brazil, and as such a measure would seriously affect a large and valuable interest in this port in sailing vessels, trading regularly between Baltimore and Brazil, built without any subsidies, those interested in the trade here have addressed a formal remonstrance against the measure, a copy of which we beg to inclose.

Yours faithfully,

F. W. WILLSON & SON.

Hon. KNUTE NELSON,
Washington, D. C.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

The undersigned, merchants of Baltimore engaged in trade between this port and Brazil, would respectfully and earnestly remonstrate against the passage of the bill now before the Senate, or any similar bill, granting subsidies to steamship lines between this country and Brazil, believing same to be unjust, as tending to build up one interest at the expense of others, and quite unnecessary, in view of the well-known fact that almost all the business between the two countries is transacted by cable messages, making the mails of comparatively little value, except for the transmission of confirmatory advices and accounts. Even were it otherwise, the mail facilities at present existing are quite ample; there being three regular lines to Brazil from United States, one to the northern and southern ports of that country, one to the northern ports only, and one to the southern only, each clearing on the average one steamer a month. In addition to these various lines bringing mails from Brazil to this country on their return trips, there are frequently as many as two outside steamers per week from Brazil bringing the mails to United States. That there is no need for a subsidy outside of the question of mail facilities is pretty well demonstrated by two facts, first, that the present business of the "United States and Brazilian Steamship Company" is so flattering that they either have arranged or are about to arrange to build two additional steamers; and, secondly, that a line started tentatively a year or more ago, called the Hammonia Line running three steamers, has been sufficiently successful as to cause the parties interested to announce that the line will be a permanent one.

Your petitioners, representing as they do the second city in point of commercial intercourse with Brazil, do not hesitate to say that it is their opinion that the passage of said subsidy would not increase existing mail facilities, for which, for the reasons above stated, there is little or no need, but would result virtually in a donation by the Government of the major part, if not the whole of the amount authorized to a company already in existence and prospering. And further, that the proposed subsidy would not increase the business between the two countries, which can only be done, as it is being done, by the active application of well-known and recognized commercial principles; and finally, that the real advocacy of said measure has for its basis more the hope of private emolument than the general good of the entire country.

BALTIMORE, July 13, 1888.

Mr. HOPKINS, of New York. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that when the committee informally rose my amendment was pending with the understanding that when the subject was recurred to for action my amendment should be considered with the first amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SOWDEN]. My amendment was to strike out lines 16 and 17.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted.

Mr. MILLS. I move that the committee rise, for the purpose of closing debate.

Mr. McCOMAS. I wish to make an amendment to the amendment.

The question recurred on Mr. MILLS's motion, and it was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. McCREARY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having, according to order, had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws for the collection of the revenue, had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. MILLS. I ask that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of resuming the consideration of the tariff bill, and, pending that motion, that all debate on the pending paragraph and all amendments thereto be closed in ten minutes.

Mr. McCOMAS. Is the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SOWDEN] now pending; and, if so, what other amendment is pending?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That information will be furnished at the proper time.

Mr. McCOMAS. I ask that the time be extended to twenty minutes.

Mr. MILLS. I move the previous question on my motion.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. MILLS. I propose five minutes on each side, and that is enough.
Mr. MCCOMAS. Make it twenty minutes.
Mr. BAYNE. I hope the gentleman will not object to making it twenty minutes.
Mr. REED. I suggest to the gentleman from Texas to make it twenty minutes. It is not much to ask in the way of extension of debate.
Mr. MILLS. We will not get through to-day.
Mr. BAYNE. Oh, yes; we will get through to-day.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The ayes seem to have it.
Mr. MCCOMAS demanded a division.
The House divided; and there were—ayes 92, noes 1.
Mr. MCCOMAS. No quorum. Twenty minutes is all we ask, ten minutes on each side.
Mr. MILLS. I move there be a call of the House.
Mr. REED. This is not a large amount of time that is asked.
Mr. MILLS. We are proposing to leave the law as it is, and there is nothing to discuss. I have proposed to strike out these three lines and leave the law as it is.
Mr. ROGERS. Regular order.
Mr. MCCOMAS. The gentleman says he proposes to restore the duty as it is now.
Mr. MILLS. That is what is proposed. I move to strike out the three lines and leave the law as it is.
Mr. MCCOMAS. On that statement I withdraw the point of no quorum.
Mr. MILLS's motion to close debate in ten minutes was then agreed to.
The question recurred on the motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.
The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.
The CHAIRMAN. The House resumes the consideration of the pending bill. By order of the House all debate on this paragraph of the bill and all amendments thereto is limited to ten minutes.
Mr. MILLS. I ask that the amendment be adopted without debate.
Mr. MCCOMAS. That is right.
The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the pending amendment, which takes precedence.
The Clerk read as follows:
In line 16 strike out "10 per cent. ad valorem" and insert "10 cents per hundred pounds."
The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 63, noes 83.
So the amendment was rejected.
The motion of Mr. MILLS to strike out the lines was then agreed to.
Mr. MILLS. In section 2, page 8, I move to strike out the date "July," in line 1 of that section, and insert "October."
The amendment was adopted.
Mr. FARQUHAR. I desire to ask a question for information. What is the status of line 167, on page 8?
The CHAIRMAN. It was stricken from the bill.
Mr. FARQUHAR. I think if the RECORD is carefully examined it will show that no legislation was taken to strike it out.
The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk's minutes show that this line was stricken out.
Mr. FARQUHAR. I know it was agreed to; but upon the RECORD there is nothing to show that it was stricken out.
The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will repeat that the minutes of the Clerk will show that it was stricken out. That of course guides the Chair in the matter and also in the making of the report. It is out of the amended bill.
The Clerk will read the next clause.
Mr. FARQUHAR. I simply say that there was no vote taken, as shown by the RECORD. Judge WILSON, I recollect, was on the floor at the time, but you will find in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD that there was no action whatever taken upon it.
The CHAIRMAN. It is possible that there may be a mistake in the RECORD in that respect, but the Chair has a positive recollection that it was stricken out.
Mr. MILLS. So have I.
Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Whatever the RECORD may show, I remember distinctly that it was voted upon.
The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next paragraph which was passed over.
The Clerk read as follows:
China, porcelain, parian, and bisque, earthen, stone, or crockery ware composed of earthy or mineral substance, including plaques, ornaments, charms, vases, and statuettes, painted, printed, enameled, or gilded, or otherwise decorated in any manner, 45 per cent. ad valorem.
China, porcelain, parian, and bisque ware not decorated in any manner, 40 per cent. ad valorem.
White granite, common ware, plain white or cream colored, lustered or printed under glaze in a single color; sponged, dipped, or edged ware, 35 per cent. ad valorem.
Brown earthenware, common stoneware, gas-retorts, and roofing tiles, not specially enumerated or provided for, and not decorated in any manner, 20 per cent. ad valorem.
All other earthen, stone, and crockery ware, white, colored, or bisque, composed of earthy or mineral substances, not specially enumerated or provided for in this act, and not decorated in any manner, 35 per cent. ad valorem.
Mr. BYNUM. On page 12, line 80, I move to strike out "forty-five" and insert "fifty;" so that it will read "50 per cent. ad valorem."
Mr. BUCHANAN. I suppose it will be in order to move to strike out the whole paragraph?
The CHAIRMAN. The amendments to the paragraph will take precedence of the motion to strike out.
Mr. BUCHANAN. This is the pottery schedule, and I would like to make this statement:
There are five paragraphs which together constitute the schedule, and I would like to ask that they may be considered together, and that I be allowed twenty minutes or twenty-five minutes, five minutes on each, for discussion. But I would like to move to strike out all of the five and have a vote upon that proposition as an entirety.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey asks that the lines of this bill from 76 to 94, inclusive, be considered as one paragraph and he be allowed to address the committee for twenty minutes on this paragraph. Is there objection?
Mr. BYNUM. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] wishes to offer an amendment preceding the amendment which I have submitted, and I therefore withhold that for the present.
The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?
There was no objection.
Mr. MILLS. There is another amendment to be offered by the gentleman from Arkansas.
The CHAIRMAN. The first question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, to strike out, in line 80, "forty-five" and insert "fifty."
Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. But before that I wish to offer an amendment.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will send it to the desk.
The Clerk read as follows:
On page 10, after line 47, insert:
"Paris green, 12½ per cent. ad valorem."
Mr. MILLS. Let us have a vote.
Mr. WARNER. I rise to enter a formal objection.
The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman oppose the amendment?
Mr. WARNER. I shall occupy but a moment's time.
The CHAIRMAN. Well, then, will the gentleman permit the vote to be taken and occupy the time on the next paragraph?
Mr. WARNER. I shall take but a few moments.
While my colleague from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] was upon the floor I asked him a question; the gentleman's answer intimated that my question misrepresented what he had said in this House as reported in the RECORD of June 10; certain it is that I do not wish to misrepresent in the slightest the position of the gentleman, as I think he well understands—I recognize the leading position he holds in the councils of his party and in the Missouri delegation.
The question I asked was, in substance, if he did not, in his remarks of June 9, say that he was here for the purpose of taking the duty off lead and off everything that he could.
Mr. BLAND. Will my colleague yield to me a moment?
Mr. WARNER. Certainly, with pleasure.
Mr. BLAND. How much time do you propose to take?
Mr. WARNER. Not more than two minutes.
Mr. BLAND. Let my speech be read. [Laughter.] The gentleman undertook to make me say on this floor that I was in favor of putting everything on the free-list and going for free trade. I said in the speech to which my colleague has reference that I was here to reduce the taxes, to take them off the people, and that for that purpose I would vote for free lead or free anything else; but the gentleman undertook to make me say that I wanted the tariff taken off everything.
Mr. WARNER. I have yielded to the gentleman nearly one-half of my time——
Mr. MILLS. I hope these gentlemen will settle this difference elsewhere. Our friends on both sides are very impatient to have a vote.
Mr. WARNER. I believe I have the floor, Mr. Chairman.
Mr. MILLS. I understand that. I am just appealing to the gentlemen.
Mr. WARNER. I will not occupy much time. On page 5490 of the RECORD of June 10, where the speech of my colleague is reported, I find that he said——
Mr. BLAND. Read the whole speech. [Laughter.]
Mr. WARNER. Wait a moment; be patient. The gentleman said what I now read:
I am not here for the purpose of voting for a tariff on lead, or a tariff on flax, or a tariff on anything, but I am here to get the tariff off everything I can.
That sentence is complete within itself. Does the gentleman stand by that declaration to-day?
Mr. BLAND. I have asked the gentleman to have my speech read in which I said that I stood here to reduce taxation.
Mr. WARNER. Does the gentleman stand by what I have just read? I challenge him for an answer.

Mr. BLAND. And I challenge the gentleman to read my whole speech. [Laughter.]

Mr. WARNER. I say, Mr. Chairman, that the declaration of my colleague in his speech of last June is free trade pure and simple, without a single qualification. That is a sentence, the enunciation of a principle, which the RECORD shows was applauded upon the other side of this Chamber. The majority of this House indorsed it. There was no qualification. When it was applauded there was only the simple, naked declaration which I have given; no addition, no word of explanation, no word qualifying it in the least; no word about the surplus, no word about taxation; it was a bold free-trade declaration, and yet, sir, on the 9th of last month your colleagues [addressing Mr. BLAND] applauded it.

After the applause the gentleman went on to say:

We have to-day, sir, in this country a taxing system that is robbing the tax-producer and every one else.

Not satisfied with stating that it robbed the tax-producer, my colleague gave the wings of his imagination full play and stated that everything else, including the dwellers in the uttermost parts of the earth, were robbed by our "taxing system."

I come to the "combine" part of my colleague's speech, for I wish to do the gentleman justice. [Laughter.] He said:

I am in a combine for the purpose of reducing taxes——

Mr. BLAND. That is it.

Mr. WARNER. Oh, that is a separate statement, separated by several sentences from the statement I have already read. My colleague said—wait until I read the entire sentence:

I am in a combine for the purpose of reducing taxes, and I will vote for a bill with free lead or free anything else in it to accomplish that purpose.

The gentleman was indiscriminate in his statement. He was for free lead, he was for free wool, he was for free anything in the world, without distinction or limitation.

The gentleman in his utterances was as a man blinded with passion and prejudice in his wild delirium, striking indiscriminately at every industry fostered by our American system of protection. He is in a combine against every protected industry. To accomplish the purpose of the combine he announces his willingness to "vote for a bill with free lead or free anything."

Mr. DINGLEY. Except the tax on sugar. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLAND. No; I did not except anything at all. When the gentleman [Mr. WARNER] reads the speech he shows that he was trying to misrepresent me, and he has read enough already to show that.

Mr. WARNER. My colleague's own language I have given. At the same time he was asked if he would vote for free lead. His answer was:

I will vote for it if it is in this bill.

[Laughter.]

Mr. BLAND. Well, I say so now; and you will not vote for it because you are the agent of the monopolies that oppress the people.

Mr. WARNER. Oh, the lead industry in Missouri is a monopoly, is it? Are the lead-miners of Missouri robbing the people? Does the gentleman envy them the wages they receive? It would be well for him to turn the efforts of his combine against something else. This combine means to throttle home industries that those of England may prosper. It means lower wages to the American wage-worker. It means lower prices for the product of the farm. It is a combine against American labor, American industries. As far as the effect of this "combine" on Missouri and her industries is concerned I might truthfully say to my colleague—

You with her foes combine,
And seem her destruction to design.

[Applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MILLS. I move that the committee now rise for the purpose of limiting debate.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. MCCREARY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SPRINGER, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that they had had under consideration the tariff bill, a bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. MILLS. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of bills raising revenue; and pending that I move that all debate on the pending paragraph and the amendments thereto be closed in one minute. I will say to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN] that this does not include his amendment. I am going to give him twenty minutes.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I understand that the gentleman's motion refers to the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE].

The motion of Mr. MILLS was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House all debate on the pending paragraph and amendments thereto is limited to one minute. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 47 insert, "Paris green 12½ per cent. ad valorem."

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will now recur to the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM], which will be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 80, page 12, strike out "forty-five" and insert "fifty."

Mr. BUCHANAN. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Pages 11 and 12, strike out lines 76 to 94 inclusive, and in lieu thereof insert:

"Brown earthenware, common stoneware, gas-retorts, and stoneware not ornamented, 25 per cent. ad valorem.

"China, porcelain, parian, and bisque, earthen, stone, and crockery ware, including plaques, ornaments, charms, vases, and statuettes, painted, printed, or gilded, or otherwise decorated or ornamented in any manner, 60 per cent. ad valorem.

"China, porcelain, parian, and bisque ware, plain white, and not ornamented or decorated in any manner, 55 per cent. ad valorem.

"All other earthen, stone, and crockery ware, white, glazed, or edged, composed of earthy or mineral substances, not especially enumerated or provided for in this act, 55 per cent. ad valorem."

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM] takes precedence of that of the gentleman from New Jersey, as it is an amendment to perfect the text. If there be no objection, the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM] will be considered as agreed to.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey, to strike out all of the lines indicated and insert what has been read. Under the order previously made by the committee, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN] is now entitled to be heard for twenty minutes.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, the pending motion is practically to strike out of the proposed bill:

China, porcelain, parian, and bisque, earthen, stone, or crockery ware composed of earthy or mineral substance, including plaques, ornaments, charms, vases, and statuettes, painted, printed, enameled, or gilded, or otherwise decorated in any manner, 45 per cent. ad valorem.

China, porcelain, parian, and bisque ware not decorated in any manner, 40 per cent. ad valorem.

White granite, common ware, plain white or cream-colored, lustered or printed under glaze in a single color; sponged, dipped, or edged ware, 35 per cent. ad valorem.

All other earthen, stone, and crockery ware, white, colored, or bisque, composed of earthy or mineral substances, not specially enumerated or provided for in this act, and not decorated in any manner, 35 per cent. ad valorem.

And in lieu thereof insert the following:

China, porcelain, parian, and bisque, earthen, stone, and crockery ware, including plaques, ornaments, charms, vases, and statuettes, painted, printed, or gilded, or otherwise decorated or ornamented in any manner, 60 per cent. ad valorem.

China, porcelain, parian, and bisque ware, plain white, and not ornamented or decorated in any manner, 55 per cent. ad valorem.

All other earthen, stone, and crockerey ware, white, glazed, or edged, composed of eathy or mineral substances, not specially enumerated or provided for in this act, 55 per cent. ad valorem.

These latter words being taken from the law as it now stands. Perhaps in no one part of this so-called "Mills bill" is there to be found shrewder work done by the enemies of home industry than in the schedule relating to earthenware. Not only is there a reduction much larger than the average in the rate, but by an ingenious reclassification the reduction is made in fact much greater than it would be by the change in rate alone. For example, in the old law two separate classes were made.

In the proposed law these classes are divided into three. So, too, lustered and underglaze print ware (in one color) are taken from the higher class and put in the very lowest class, along with "common ware and plain white."

For the operation of lustering or of printing no allowance whatever is made. These examples are sufficient to show even those who know nothing about the art of pottery, that the reclassification in this bill results, as I have said, in a practical reduction far beyond the reduction in rate alone.

This schedule shows the mark of an ingenious hand, and an ingenious hand was engaged in its preparation. Whatever member of the Ways and Means Committee may have written the actual words in this part of the bill, I charge, here and now, that the matter and ideas as to classification were furnished by a Boston importer. Of course the lower he can get the rate the more goods he can bring in, and what matters it to him if he fill his pockets with profits on foreign-made goods whether our own factories fill up with unbought goods or not.

The whole philosophy of this bill seems to be that it is better to still further enrich the "swell-front" importer of Boston, or the Fifth avenue "brown-stone front" importer of New York, than to so legislate as to secure employment to our own labor here at home. The consumption of crockery is at a practically fixed rate, and the more there is brought into this country from abroad, the less can be sold of the home product. The consumption of crockery yearly in the United States is from $10,000,000 to $12,000,000. At the present time about one-half of this is produced in this country, and about one-half imported.

If we so legislate as that three-fourths will be imported, it follows that we will have but one-fourth of the market left for us to supply instead of one-half, and our production, for want of a market, must be reduced 50 per cent. That such a result is eagerly hoped for across the ocean, from the passage of this bill, is apparent. I read from a recent issue of the Pottery Gazette (England). Speaking of the prospects of the English manufacturers, that paper says:

American merchants, by the way, are said to be holding back orders just now on account of the proposed alteration in the tariff. If this is so, stocks will soon decrease, and should the duty be reduced 15 per cent., as it is proposed, then those directly in that trade will have good times to report.

It will be noted that this paper speaks of the proposed reduction as being 15 per cent. Even with that it hopes for good times for those in the American trade. With an actual reduction, as I have shown this bill proposes, of nearly one-half its hopes must rise correspondingly.

Why, even the bare introduction of this bill has had a most harmful effect upon the home production. Our potters do not sell to any great extent to the jobbers. They prefer to sell direct to the retailers, and thus bring producer and consumer one degree nearer together and dispense with all intermediate commissions, storage, and other charges. This necessitates the keeping on hand at all times of a large stock from which to fill the varied orders as they come in.

The agitation about this bill has caused a great falling off in orders, and stocks have accumulated until the warerooms are overcrowded and production is being limited more and more, and consequently employment ceases. I select the following as a sample of its effects in my own city:

The editor of the State Gazette a few days ago addressed the following note to a number of the leading manufacturers of the city:

"DEAR SIR: Please inform me, at your earliest convenience, what effect the tariff agitation and the threatened passage of the Mills bill are having upon your business."

The following answers have been received among others:

"THE POTTERY TRADE PARALYZED.

"UNION POTTERY COMPANY, Trenton, May 21, 1888.

"DEAR SIR: The tariff agitation this spring has, in our judgment, unsettled the crockery trade to the extent of decreasing sales from 30 to 40 per cent. as compared with last year. The orders given are in the main only for necessities.

"I have not known as dull a spring business in ten years. We have authentic information from Staffordshire, England, that a jubilant feeling prevails in the potteries over the expected passage of the Mills bill, and brilliant promises are made to employés by manufacturers after its passage.

"Yours, etc.,

"UNION POTTERY COMPANY,
"JAMES G. LEE, President.

"WILLIAM CLOKE, Editor State Gazette."

The following is from the mayor of my city:

[Empire Pottery, Alpaugh & Magowan, proprietors.]

Replying to your inquiry, what effect the tariff agitation and threatened passage of Mills bill has upon our business, I will say it has decreased sales about 25 per cent. We have not produced as many goods this year as formerly, but our stock has accumulated to such an extent that we have no more room for storage, and we will be obliged soon to shut down our works and throw out of employment hundreds of men, women, and children.

This will be the first time during my connection with the pottery business that we are obliged to close our works at this time of the year. No use trying to sell the goods. Buyers all over the country tell the same story—that they will wait until Congress takes a vote on the Mills bill, "for if it passes," they say, "we will buy crockery of American manufacture at 25 per cent. less prices, or imported goods for still less money."

FRANK A. MAGOWAN.

While these buyers are in fact mistaken, as the history of the pottery trade shows, in supposing they will be able to buy foreign goods cheaper after legislation has closed our home factories and so home competition will have been crushed out, the fact remains that they are waiting the progress of events.

The following is from a former member of this House, personally known to many of you as a gentleman thoroughly informed as to the pottery trade in all its aspects:

OTT & BREWER COMPANY, Trenton, May 25, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: In reply to your inquiry about the effect of the agitation over the Mills bill upon the pottery trade, I will say that business is very dull and our customers all agree that it is in consequence of this agitation. Capital is sensitive, and the uncertainty of the present situation has a very depressing effect.

OTT & BREWER COMPANY,
J. H. BREWER, President.

Next to Trenton, East Liverpool, Ohio, is the largest producing point in pottery in the United States. From thence comes one consensus of opinion as to the effect of this agitation.

An East Liverpool, Ohio, dispatch to the Cleveland Plaindealer of recent date says:

"When calling upon Goodwin Bros., Mr. James Goodwin, the senior member, who had just returned from the post-office, showed me his mail, consisting of one letter, and said the orders this week consisted of two assorted packages. For the last month orders have been gradually dropping off until he had been compelled to close down. The reason is because the trade consists largely of jobbing trade, and in view of the pending Mills bill they are holding off to await developments, for its passage will mean cheaper foreign goods, which can be met only by reducing labor, as they now pay 125 per cent. more wages than the English. He said, 'Give us the English rate of wages and they may take off all the duty on crockery.'

"In conclusion Mr. Goodwin stated: 'Our order-books are open for inspection by any one, and to-day show three orders, or about three casks. One hundred and fifty hands are unemployed. During the past year we have torn down some old frame buildings that have stood for twenty years and have put up brick instead, but it was simply a question of tearing down or falling down.'

"William Brunt, Son & Co. were next seen and report a large falling off of orders the past month. They said, 'Allow us to pay English prices to our men and we want no tariff.

"George S. Harker & Co. being called upon, said: 'We have no orders at all, and are only running in order to assort up our stock.' Will Harker, of this firm, showed a letter from a large Western jobber, who stated that the reason he was not handling more goods was that he wanted to see the fate of the Mills bill, and would allow his stock to run down until then, as he would be able to buy English goods much cheaper if it passed.

"Wallace & Chetwynd reported orders were very slack and gradually falling off.

"Cartwright Brothers declared that their orders were getting scarcer every day. Knowles, Taylor & Knowles report that they are running at half capacity now, although trade was good in the early part of the year. The contracts for the new building were let last year, otherwise they would not build. Homer Laughlin says that if it were not for the orders contracted for last year, they would have shut down. Vodrey Brothers report very few orders, and said the jobbers were waiting the result of the Mills bill."

The manufacture of pottery has peculiarities all its own, and I doubt if there are five men in this House who have the remotest idea in relation to the processes employed. I have not time to speak of them in detail, but can only advert to a few of the leading features:

First. It is one of the most ancient of arts. In a recent speech in my city by Mr. John D. McCormack (himself a potter, working at the wheel, welcoming the annual convention of the Operative Potters, he said:

The ancient and venerable potters' art, in which we are engaged, is the oldest and most honorable art known to history. It was old when the Crusaders went forth to battle in defense of their firesides and of European civilization against the code of Mohammed in 1098 A. D. It was old when Jesus of Nazareth came and died to redeem mankind. It was old when Julius Cæsar was born, in the year 96 B. C. It was old when Rome was built, 753 years B. C. It was old when Solomon's Temple was built, 1,000 years B. C. It was old when Moses delivered the Israelites from Egyptian bondage, 1487 B. C. It was old when the Tower of Babel was commenced, 2230 B. C. It was old when the pyramids of Egypt were built. It was old when the ark of Noah floated upon the turbulent waters of the flood and preserved the human race from complete destruction, 2,464 years B. C. It is older than the Old Testament itself.

Second. The art is one which must always from its nature be carried on by hand labor. In some of the coarser lines of goods machinery may be employed to press or fashion into shape; some improvements in reducing the flints and spars to powder have been made, and some machinery has been introduced to mix and dry the materials (I am talking with as few technical terms as possible); but, after all, the potter's wheel as spoken of by the Prophet Jeremiah and as painted in the tombs of the Pharoahs is in use to-day. There seems to be a delicacy and fineness of touch of the human hand which responds to the nature of the material which no inanimate machine can equal.

Third. The processes are many and difficult, and great wastage occurs at every step. After all the time and labor expended in mining and washing the clays, in mining, calcining, and grinding to powder the flint and the spar (and it is labor and expense every step of the way), these materials must be tested, mixed, dried, and prepared for the wheel or the mold. Take a common, white, undecorated dinner plate. From the time it leaves the hand of the workman who shapes it until it is packed ready for shipment it is handled more than a score of separate times by hand labor.

At every stage of its progress a percentage of breakage occurs, and this is a total loss. Into the drying-room and out of the drying-room; into the kiln shed; thence into the saggers in which it is burned; thence through the fervent heat of the kiln; out of the kiln to the dipping-room; through the dipping-tub again to the kiln shed, the sagger, and the heat of the kiln; from the kiln to those who inspect and assort; to the wareroom; thence to the packing shed; into the package—at every handling, labor must be expended and loss occurs, not the loss of the material simply but of the labor previously expended upon the piece. Six hundred years before the time of our Saviour the Prophet Jeremiah wrote:

The word which came to Jeremiah from the Lord, saying, Arise and go down to the potter's house—

[Derisive applause on the Democratic side.]

I am glad gentlemen over there applaud Jeremiah; he is good authority. I presume they hear of him now for the first time. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

and there I will cause thee to hear my words. Then I went down to the potter's house, and behold, he wrought a work on the wheels; and the vessel that he made of clay was marred in the hand of the potter, so he made it again another vessel as seemed good to the potter to make it. (Jeremiah XVIII, 1-6.)

Or, as the Douay version tersely puts it:

And the vessel was broken which he was making of clay with his hands; and turning, he made another vessel as it seemed good in his eyes to make it.

Take a more artistic and highly finished piece of ware. Here is a cup. It is not made for use, but for ornament, though it can be used. See these raised decorations of metal. They are laid on a smooth surface by repeated applications of the brush—built up as it were. This cup has been in the kiln eight separate times. It has been handled between fifty and one hundred separate times.

At the last moment, when placed on the shelf to await packing for shipment, this flaw was noticed. Had it been perfect with its saucer it would have been worth in the packing-room $4.50. As it is, it is worthless for purposes of sale. Take this vase, made in the same way.

It is worth $12. The handles are of open work. At the last firing its mate was ruined. Thus I have given examples from the plainest ware and the most costly—that which is used every day and that which is only and solely for ornament. A broken plate or cup or vase is total loss of material and all the labor from the clay pit or quarry to the place of breakage.

Fourth. This labor is not common drudgery, which simply lifts or strikes or guides. The potter is in the true sense an artist. Look at the thousand forms of beauty and grace he designs and shapes. Look at the rich decorations with which he covers plate and cup and vase. Observe the fineness of the drawing, the harmony of color, and the rich and tasteful effects of the whole. This labor is more valuable than the labor merely of muscle and sinew. It demands more and should receive more. It is the labor of intelligent men. Take the speech of Mr. McCormack, from which I have quoted, and no gentleman on this floor would be unwilling to be accounted its author. When, the past winter, a member of the British Parliament visited my city, the address of welcome was made by an operative potter.

John O'Neil, another operative potter, and president of their national union, speaking of the aims of that order, says:

For the edification of those not familiar with the order, it is proper for us to state that we have three objects at heart—the first is the maintenance of a fair rate of wages; the second, the encouragement of good workmen; and third, the elevation of the operative potter in the social scale of life and the advancement of the art.

Could any gentleman here put it better?

A daily paper, speaking of the meeting of the union, says of these workingmen:

The potters that assembled in convention here were a fine-looking body of men, active, intelligent, and bearing the marks of prosperity.

A working potter represents the district in which I reside in our State Legislature. Two, at least, are in our city council, and a very large proportion own the houses they live in.

Mr. Chairman, these are the people this bill strikes at. These are the men and women whose wages you would reduce. These are the honest, intelligent citizens whose interests you would imperil.

Even under the law as it now stands the importations of crockery are increasing. The importations of crockery into the United States for the eleven months ending May 31, 1887, were $5,148,219. In the eleven months ending May 31, 1888, they were $5,847,088, an increase of $698,879. Every plate, every saucer, every cup so imported could have been made here, and by its coming supplanted a plate, a saucer, a cup which an American workman could and would have made. If the importations continue at this rate the remaining month to be reported, the imports for the year ending June 30, 1888, will be $6,334,345. For 1887 it was $5,716,927.

While pottery is an ancient art, it is in its exercise here new. I am speaking, of course, exclusively of the white-ware production. In 1860 there was, practically, no white or decorated ware produced here. It was the common-yellow ware. To-day one-half of all the pottery sold in the United States is made here. In the older countries where the material beds have been resorted to for centuries their working qualities are well known. Here we are compelled to resort constantly to new deposits, the working of which can only be ascertained by experiment. Want of knowledge of the working qualities of our materials at first resulted in deficient wares, and a prejudice against them grew up which it has taken years of effort and careful experiment and has cost much expenditure of money to surmount. But in spite of all drawbacks our people have persevered, until now we make as fine goods as the world can produce.

We have in our city four banks. I have here a letter from the cashier of one of these banks, in which he gives the amount of money paid out the past year by that bank on pay-roll checks for the potteries having accounts at that bank at the sum of $1,096,316, or the sum of $21,083 per week.

I have not the exact data from the other banks, but have sufficient to show that the annual payment of wages in this one branch in my city alone is nearly or quite $3,000,000.

These are the workmen, this is the interest you would crush. At whose behest? It is well known that an importer from Boston took a leading part in suggesting this portion of the Mills bill.

By samples he furnished and information he gave this reclassification was framed, without any opportunity given to the producers to cross-examine him as to his allegations, and how are you passing this bill? You listen to no arguments. While the facts are being brought out which demonstrate the injurious effect the bill will have on the workingmen of the country you retire to the cloak-rooms to smoke your cigars and tell yarns, only to rush out and vote when the signal is given, and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] throws his arms up in the air and cries "all up." Oh, it will soon be "all up" with him if he perseveres. I clip the following from the Philadelphia Press of March 20 last:

FREE-TRADERS FEASTING.—THE FATHER OF THE MILLS TARIFF BILL BANQUETS THE DEMOCRATIC MEMBERS.

WASHINGTON, March 21 (special).

A distinguished company sat down to dinner at Chamberlain's this evening. The host was Mr. "Parsee" Moore, who came to this country some years ago as the agent of a firm of English manufacturers and succeeded so well that, if he did not actually write the President's last message, he certainly held the ink bottle, and did it so well that he was the one expert consulted by the Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee when they set to work to frame a tariff.

It is quite well understood that he is the real author of the bill promulgated under the nom de plume of ROGER Q. MILLS, and nobody can dispute the fitness of his giving a dinner to-night to celebrate its getting through the committee. Besides, Mr. MILLS has to make a report on the bill now, and Mr. Moore had to tell him what to say. His guests this evening were Speaker CARLISLE and the Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee.

The feast was of the fattest and the finest, and the whole affair passed off with great éclat. Many of the viands were American products, but Mr. Moore's assurance that the cook was imported removed all objection. The bill of fare was ornately printed in French, and as Mr. MILLS took up the consideration of it section by section, without the least notion of what it all meant, it reminded him so forcibly of the proceedings in the tariff bill that he startled the waiters by moving to save time by adopting it as a whole.

I presume the account is somewhat colored, but that the feast did take place there is no doubt. Sir, these gentlemen may feast now; to-day they are voting; but the workingman is reading and thinking and he will have his turn by and by. Well do I remember a scene a few years ago in the room of the Committee on Ways and Means, when an iron-worker was pleading in vain with a member of that committee to amend his bill. He received scant courtesy, and finally, drawing his form to his full height, his eye lighted with the fire of defiance, he said in earnest tones: "Well, sir, we make Congressmen, and if we can not get our rights here we will get them elsewhere;" and the warning was, in that instance, not an idle one.

That this reduction proposed in this bill will seriously affect this industry can not be successfully denied. Lustered ware, and under glaze print in a single color suffer, as already shown, a reduction of nearly one-half. All the finer ware of at least one-fourth, and plain white almost two-fifths. Any one at all familiar with the industry will know that these extensive reductions will wipe out all possible margin over cost of production and beside cut into such cost, including wages and very seriously so. Capital will not be likely to continue to produce at a loss, and, so if production continues under the terms imposed by this bill, this lost margin as well as any profit upon production must be made up by a reduction in the present cost of production.

For whose benefit and at whose request is this reduction to be made? The consumers do not ask it. I have failed to hear of one petition from them for it. I have the protest of thousands against it. The importer no doubt wants it; for the sake of the profit he makes in handling the goods he is willing that the nation should send its gold abroad to buy what we ought to make at home. The foreign manufacturer wants it. He wants to empty his overloaded shelves on our market. He has his resident agent here, to whom he invoices the goods at any figure he chooses, and who is now intently watching the progress of this bill.

In behalf of the men of enterprise, energy, and courage who have put years of hardest thought and toil into the task of making this industry a success here, and whose business energy and judgment have been the occasion of employment to so many of our people, I plead for my amendment.

In behalf of this labor, working as some of it must in damp clay and mixing rooms; working as some of it does in the flying dust of the pressers' room, and contracting as it often does the "potter's asthma;" working as some of it does in the dipping room, and exposed to the horrors of lead poisoning—deserving as it all is, I plead for my amendment.

In behalf of my city, whose prosperity has been so enhanced by the existence in its midst of this interest, whose trade is enlivened by this constant stream of wages percolating through all the channels of business, as it is expended for the necessaries and comforts of life, and whose population has received such an addition of industrious, intelligent, useful citizens, I plead for my amendment.

In behalf of my country, whose welfare depends upon the continued existence in her borders of a contented, well-paid wage-earning people, whose interests are best conserved as she reaches the position of producing within her own bounds all she needs to use, and whose people are second to none in their ability to produce anything the wit of man can devise or the wants of the world may require, I plead for my amendment.

[During the delivery of the foregoing remarks, when twenty minutes had expired, unanimous consent was granted, on motion of Mr. BURROWS, that Mr. BUCHANAN be allowed five minutes additional to conclude his remarks.]

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN] has made such an excursion into ancient history, going back to the days of Jeremiah the Prophet, that he has had no time to examine the bill upon which he has spoken. The assertions he has made as to the effect of the bill and as to its details can not be sustained by any reference to the bill itself.

And, Mr. Chairman, I would suggest to the gentleman that it might occur to some people that an industry as old as he represents this one to be should appoint some time when it would cease to ask bounties and subsidies for its support at the hands of the tax-payers of the country.

Mr. BUCHANAN. When wages and other conditions are even the world over; that is the time.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. Let me say to the gentleman that the rates of duty imposed in these schedules will pay all the wages given to the workmen in New Jersey or elsewhere engaged in the production of pottery.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I make the assertion here, after some study of this pottery schedule and some time spent in its preparation, that in point of fact, with the exception of a reduction in a single class, it operates no real reduction in the present rates on pottery. In the tariff provision of 1883, when Congress repealed the duty on coverings and crates, it was stated by Mr. MORRILL that it was equivalent to 10 per cent., and the repeal was made the excuse for a like advance in the rates of the pottery schedule.

The gentleman from New Jersey, if he had been accurately informed as to the provisions of this bill and had been as desirous of making a speech which would give the House correct information as he was of bringing up past history and the lamentations of Jeremiah, would have told the committee that this bill restores the duty on crates and coverings; he would also have told the committee, as in fairness he should have done, that this bill takes from the importer the drawback heretofore allowed for damage to pottery imported into this country.

There are two substantial advantages, each one of which operates an increase of protection on pottery, which are kept entirely out of view by the gentleman from New Jersey, if indeed he was at all aware of them. Moreover, Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from New Jersey had looked a little deeper into this matter, and read the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the "Collection of Duties," made to Congress in 1885, he would have found that the pottery schedule is one in which undervaluations are most marked, and that Treasury special agents at both New York and Boston, whose reports are contained in this volume, go so far as to estimate that undervaluation as high as 10 per cent., or even 20 per cent.

We offer here in this bill the best that could be accomplished by the efforts of three successive Secretaries of the Treasury engaged in the administration of this law, by the work of our late eminent colleague, Mr. Hewitt, and by the work of our own committee to prevent these undervaluations in the future.

So, Mr. Chairman, the fact is as I stated in the beginning, there is a seeming but scarcely any real reduction proposed in this pottery schedule, except in the common class of pottery, which, through some error in the revision of 1883, was jumped up into the 60 per cent. class.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Will the gentleman be kind enough to state to the House what the packages are? Are they not old hogsheads or crates?

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. I answer by asking that the letter I send up to the Clerk be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

NEW YORK, June, 1888.

DEAR SIR: Permit me to ask your attention to the following actual transaction, as exemplifying the increased duty which would be levied upon plain white and decorated earthenware, if such were assessed in the cost of crates in addition to that now paid upon the goods only:

I imported 484 crates of earthenware April 3, 1888, ex steamer Duke of Buckingham, at Newport News, Va., paying duty thereon as follows:

261 crates plain white, value $7,513.51, at 55 per cent	$4,132.43
223 crates decorated, value $10,970.71, at 60 per cent	6,582.43
Total duty paid	10,714.86

With the cost of crates added I would be assessed on 261 crates plain white, value $8,542.35, at 55 per cent., $4,698.28, or 68.7 per cent., additional 13.7 per cent.; 223 crates decorated, value $11,867.46, at 60 per cent., $7,120.47, or 68⅛ per cent., additional 8⅛ per cent. All these figures can be verified by reference to my entry on file at Newport News.

Were your bill passed as originally introduced, the reduction from present rates would only be on plain white, 6.3 per cent.; on decorated, 6⅜ per cent.

The importation specified is a fair and impartial example, and the result is correct and unprejudiced.

Respectfully,

THOMAS H. TAYLOR.

Hon. R. Q. MILLS,
Chairman Ways and Means Committee, Washington.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the pending amendment is exhausted.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I am not surprised they have that kind of information, and I challenge it here and now.

Mr. GOFF. Mr. Chairman, my colleague submits in his remarks that this bill throughout makes no reduction of import duty so far as this whole schedule is concerned. My colleague is not correct in that particular. We have an extraordinary statement submitted to the House by the Committee on Ways and Means relative to the reductions proposed by this bill. My colleague, I judge from his remarks, took part in the preparation of this statement and I infer from what he has said he had the preparation of this schedule. He tells us so far as this schedule is concerned there is to be no reduction, and I find by the statement submitted to the country there is reduction so far as chinaware is concerned from $2,565,000 to $1,223,000 import duties.

That is the estimate of the Committee on Ways and Means on this isolated item, and yet we are told by that committee that the bill we are now debating on this schedule makes no reduction.

I have cited one instance. We also find in reference to earthenware and stone and crockery, the Committee on Ways and Means find under the present import duty the revenue amounts to $576,328.96, and they estimate the reduction in this particular item alone will be $187,755.99. And so on all through this schedule. But I have not time to take up all the items one by one.

So we see that there is reduction and a very material reduction. I will not say the Committee on Ways and Means did not take into consideration the very questions which the gentleman alluded to a moment ago when he said the matter of packing had not been considered by the gentleman from New Jersey. Surely the members of the Committee on Ways and Means did not omit that very important item.

This is a most important reduction made here and all through this bill. Whatever my friends on the other side may claim, I say that the statistics of the country, I say that the reports of our consuls in foreign lands, I say the pay-rolls of our factories demonstrate beyond all question that the labor of this country is paid 100 per cent. more than the labor in any other country in this particular industry.

Seventy-five per cent. has been conceded in former discussions on this schedule; and yet we are told now that the reduction is not material. And my friend facetiously and eloquently alludes to the "age" of this industry. It may be that it has reached a mature age in foreign lands, where these articles are manufactured that are now to flood this land in competition with those made by our own people. I concede that. But it is against those established and ancient industries that we ask protection.

Nobody knows better than my colleague that this industry has not been protected in this country twenty years. He knows it well. He knows that in his own State the industry is now prosperous, but can not afford the reduction which is proposed, and that it is only within fifteen years that it has been successfully established there. And my colleague knows also that the men who toil in this industry there and are making that young State what it is, receive 80 per cent. more than the wages of those who labor in the Old World, and with whom he is so anxious to invite this competition. [Applause on the Republican side.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will regard the pro forma amendment as withdrawn.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. I renew it.

My colleague has misunderstood the point in controversy between myself and the gentleman from New Jersey. I made no reference to the reduction of the revenue; that was not a point to which my attention was at all directed, but it was in reference to the reduction of the protection that I was speaking. I made the assertion then, and I repeat it, that with the exception of the common grade of pottery, which ought never to have been put into the highest schedule—that grade of pottery which is used by the poor people of the country, and in the manufacture of which no special skill is required—with that exception the reductions made in this schedule, when taken in connection with the items I mentioned, will diminish very slightly, if at all, the existing rates upon pottery in this country.

And so far as the difference of labor in the United States and in Europe is concerned, I would be perfectly willing, for the sake of argument, to accept the figures given by my colleague. I would agree for the sake of the argument what I would not agree to as a fact, that wages here are 100 per cent. greater in this industry than in Staffordshire, England; still the rates of duty given in this bill will compensate, as a rule, for the entire labor cost in the production of pottery in this country.

Now, the gentleman from New Jersey, in seeking to restore the rates of the old schedule, is perfectly willing to accept all the advantages secured by this bill—the advantage of bringing again under duty the crates and coverings, equal, in the common grades of pottery, as I have shown by actual transactions, to 10 per cent at least, the abolition of drawbacks for damages, and the improved method of appraisement by which undervaluations are prevented—all of which add substantially to his protection, and in addition to demand the present schedule of rates.

One more sentence from a letter of Secretary Fairchild bearing upon this subject and I am done.

While the effect—

Says the Secretary in his letter contained in the report on this bill—of section 6 would be to increase the dutiable value of merchandise subject to ad valorem duties—

It is the assessment of the coverings to which he is alluding, the number of the section being different from what it was when he wrote his letter—its tendency at the same time would be to restrict speculative importations which have been stimulated by the opportunities for evasion afforded by the present law as interpreted by the Supreme Court and construed by the Attorney-General.

And it is exactly at that point, from the speculative importations of pottery possible under the undervaluations, that the pottery interest has suffered its greatest competition.

Mr. MILLS. I now ask a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. MILLS. If we can not have a vote, I shall move that the committee rise.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I only want five minutes.

Mr. MILLS. If that be all, then I shall not object.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to closing the debate in five minutes?

Mr. GOFF. We can not accept that.

Mr. BUCHANAN. With reference to the question of packages——

Mr. MILLS. I want to know if that suggestion is accepted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair heard no objection.

Mr. GOFF. I did object.

Mr. MILLS. We are anxious to close the bill.

Mr. BURROWS. The gentleman from West Virginia, I understand, wants five minutes. I think that will be all the discussion.

Mr. BUCHANAN. We are practically through.

Mr. MILLS. Very well; I will say ten minutes in all.

Mr. BUCHANAN. With reference to the question of packages, I want to say that I do know what I was talking about. I live in a city that makes the goods, and I see these packages every day when I am at home, and the packages which are used for the packing of pottery are either old sugar hogsheads or open-work crates made of rough boughs and withes twisted together. Gentlemen can see what the value of these is.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. That is what you are sending off your pottery in, is it not?

Mr. BUCHANAN. What was the gentleman saying?

Mr. MILLS. They are such packages as are used in this country, are they not?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Certainly, sir; and we buy some of the men who bring them over.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. Some of the pottery made in this country is sent off in the cars without any covering at all.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Loaded in bulk?

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. Yes.

Mr. BUCHANAN. That may be so in some thriftless localities, but it is not done in my city.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. It is done in Trenton.

Mr. BUCHANAN. What? Loaded in bulk? Good crockery?

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. I did not say good crockery.

Mr. BUCHANAN. After hearing you make that statement I do not wonder that you believed anything that Boston man told you. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. This comes from a Trenton man.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I know these packages, and I know what they are.

Now, as to undervaluation, it is true that in the past we have suffered from undervaluation. That has been a gross and persistent abuse at the custom-house, and I do not hesitate to say that under the provisions of this bill, carefully guarded as they are, those undervaluations will continue. It seems to be impossible to make legislation so stringent that some sharp-witted importer and some fellow in the custom-house who is ready to be bribed will not be able to evade its provisions.

It will be remembered that all crockery comes in under an ad valorem rate. It must be, or at least it ought to be, known to this House that to-day almost every manufacturer on the other side has his brother or his son or his confidential agent on this side, to whom he bills his goods without any actual sale whatever, at any price that the conscience of the consul on the other side will pass and his own conscience will allow.

And as to the drawback for damages, I know something about it. At the request of producers in my city I have inspected these cargoes as they were opened at the custom-house, and the drawbacks for damages are practically nominal. The trouble is in the evasions of the law in packing the goods in these packages. They will place—I state what my own eyes have seen—they will place good pieces of ware among those of an inferior grade, so that all will be admitted at the lower rate. That practice will continue, I say, as long as there is a dishonest importer and a dishonest customs official, and when every importer is honest and every customs official is honest we shall need no legislation, for the millennium will have come. [Laughter.]

Mr. GOFF. My colleague [Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia] insists that I misunderstood him in his use of the word "reduction," and claims that he referred not to the question of revenue, but to the question of protection. Now, as I showed before, my colleague's statement on behalf of the Committee on Ways and Means disposed of the question of protection as well as of the question of revenue, and surely the logic of the argument submitted by my colleague is that, owing to excessive protection, these manufacturers or "monopolists" have been enabled to place this difference in their own pockets, so that the consumer or the American purchaser has been compelled to pay an enhanced price for the article. My colleague's concession that this statement from the Ways and Means Committee is true—for he virtually concedes that in his argument—also disposes effectually of his claim that there is no reduction in the protection, provided always that we give full force and effect to the argument which he and his colleagues of the Ways and Means Committee have submitted to the House.

Now, I want to go further and say that the effect of this reduction of 15 per cent. in this first item under consideration will not make the reduction in the revenue that my colleague claims.

Mr. BYNUM. The gentleman is mistaken. It is now 10 per cent.

Mr. GOFF. Well, it is 15 per cent. in the bill and 10 per cent. in the amendment agreed upon in the Democratic caucus and submitted now. The very same argument made before the committee by those interested in this industry when this bill was reported at 45 per cent. is just as applicable to-day upon the change that has been made by the committee; because, while you have conceded a part of the claim, you have not conceded sufficient to enable these industries to work successfully in the future.

Surely you want to accomplish that which from your own standpoint will result in the reduction of the cost of these articles to purchasers in this country. Now, the entire industrial history of this country demonstrates that if you lower the import duties, as you are here endeavoring to do, the result will be to increase the revenue. In other words, the china, crockery, and earthen ware that we manufacture in this country now by virtue of the protection given to our labor can no longer be manufactured here if this bill becomes law. Our importers will send across the sea for it, and it will come into our ports from abroad, and the result will be in the future, as it has been in the past, that the English manufacturer will shove his prices up as soon as he has disposed of the American producer. The history which my colleague is so fond of alluding to demonstrates that beyond all reasonable doubt.

There are just as noted rich and powerful "trusts," especially in this china trade, on the other side of the water as any of those on this side against which gentlemen on the other side of the House have raised their voices in protest. My friend will not deny that.

My colleague tells us that he studied this question carefully in the preparation of this schedule. Other members of the Committee on Ways and Means doubtless did the same. I would like any one of them to tell me under what classification this vase [holding up a vase] would come in. The committee had such vases before them; as a matter of course they took the testimony of experts. I would not question that they wanted to reach a just and wise conclusion in order to properly care for the industries of this country. Therefore the gentlemen of that committee are no doubt able at once, without a moment's hesitation, to tell me under which classification this vase would come in.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. I will state to the gentleman, and I would like to make this reply also to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN], that the charge that we took the testimony of importers alone is entirely unfounded.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I did not say that. I said you did not allow our manufacturers to cross-examine them.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. We had no manufacturers before us.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Because they did not know the importers were there. If you had held open sessions we could then have had an open field and a fair fight.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. They were able to take care of themselves.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The importers seem to be able to take care of themselves.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. I had long conversations with Mr. Brewer, formerly a member of the House, from whom I obtained information, and also with Mr. Pearson, of Wheeling——

Mr. GOFF. A very estimable gentleman.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. These gentlemen, as my colleague will admit, are well informed on this subject.

Mr. GOFF. That is the very reason my colleague can answer my question.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. We had all kinds of pottery before us, and had those gentlemen make their explanations in regard to them. I could not, of course, carry all those explanations in my memory. I am not an expert, but when we were dealing with this subject we had before us gentlemen who knew much more on the subject than any member of the House, to explain the different points.

Mr. GOFF. Will the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means tell me under what classification this vase would come?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Oh, that is cruelty.

Mr. MILLS. If the gentleman from West Virginia had not been posted about this matter about ten or fifteen minutes ago by a pottery man he could not have answered the question himself.

Mr. GOFF. I think I know something about the subject. If you think I do not, try me.

Mr. BYNUM (holding up a plate). Will the gentleman tell me what kind of ware this is?

Mr. GOFF. It is a long way off, but from here it looks like common earthenware,

Mr. BYNUM. Come over and examine it.

Mr. GOFF. I think I can answer the gentleman's question; but I want to state that I am not professing to have all the wisdom on this question that gentlemen on the other side of the House claim to have. [Applause on the Republican side.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GOFF. As gentlemen on the other side have had extensions of time, I think I am entitled to a five-minutes extension.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on this proposition is exhausted. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN]. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The amendment was read, as follows:

Pages 11 and 12, strike out lines 76 to 94, inclusive, and in lieu thereof insert:

"Brown earthenware, common stoneware, gas retorts, and stoneware not ornamented, 25 per cent. ad valorem.

"China, porcelain, parian, and bisque, earthen, stone, and crockery ware, including plaques, ornaments, charms, vases, and statuettes, painted, printed, or gilded, or otherwise decorated or ornamented in any manner, 60 per cent. ad valorem.

"China, porcelain, parian, and bisque ware, plain white, and not ornamented or decorated in any manner, 55 per cent. ad valorem.

"All other earthen, stone, and crockery ware, white, glazed, or edged, composed of earthy or mineral substances, not especially enumerated or provided for in this act, 55 per cent. ad valorem."

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected—there being ayes 85, noes 90.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the next paragraph which was passed over.

The Clerk read as follows:

Green and colored glass bottles, vials, demijohns and carboys (covered or uncovered), pickle or preserve jars, and other plain, molded, or pressed green and colored bottle-glass, not cut, engraved or painted, and not specially enumerated or provided for, three-fourths of 1 cent per pound; if filled, and not otherwise provided for, and the contents are subject to an ad valorem duty, or to a rate of duty based on their value, the value of such bottles, vials, or other vessels shall be added to the value of the contents for the ascertainment of the dutiable value of the latter; but if filled and not otherwise provided for, and the contents are not subject to an ad valorem duty or to a rate of duty based on their value, they shall pay a duty of three-fourths of 1 cent per pound in addition to the duty, if any, on their contents.

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment pending to strike out, in line 107, "three-fourths of 1 cent" and insert "1 cent."

Mr. GUENTHER. Mr. Chairman, when this paragraph was reached in the discussion which was had during my absence, the committee kindly consented to pass over the paragraph informally in order to give me a chance to be heard, assuming that I knew something about this question which it might be worth while for the committee to hear.

Mr. Chairman, I have heard it stated over and over again that one of the objects in presenting this bill to the House was to correct existing incongruities in the present tariff. On reading over the RECORD, I find that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN], a member of the Committee on Ways and Means, moved to strike out the whole paragraph, the result of which would be to leave the duty as it is at present on both empty and filled bottles.

And the amendment of the gentleman from Texas is of the same purport. I do not know whether he intends to offer another amendment covering filled bottles.

There is a glaring inconsistency in the present tariff in regard to these bottles; and it is not chargeable either to the Republican or Democratic party. Gentlemen who were here in the Forty-seventh Congress will remember that when the tariff bill was under discussion in the Senate that the Committee on Finance recommended the duty on green bottles covered by this paragraph, that theretofore in the Morrill tariff bill up to 1883 had been 35 per cent. ad valorem on empty and filled bottles should be reduced to 30 per cent. ad valorem in both cases.

The Committee of the Whole of the Senate changed the rate and placed in its stead a specific duty of 1½ cents per pound, but when it came up in the Senate the Senate again restored the duty of 30 per cent. ad valorem as recommended by the Committee on Finance of the Senate. When the tariff bill came up in the House in the Forty-seventh Congress it contained a specific duty of 1½ cents per pound as recommended by the Committee on Ways and Means. And gentlemen of the Forty-seventh Congress will remember that on my motion the rate of the Morrill tariff of 35 per cent. ad valorem was inserted instead, and on motion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARLISLE] the rate in regard to filled bottles was made to conform with it, and also put at 35 per cent. ad valorem.

But you also remember this bill in the last days of the session went to a conference, and the conference committee, by oversight or otherwise (I could never find out), placed the duty on empty bottles at 1 cent per pound specific duty, and left the duty on filled bottles at 30 per cent. ad valorem. The specific duty on empty bottles of 1 per cent. amounted to about 70 per cent. ad valorem against 30 per cent. on bottles when imported filled.

Now this Mills bill places, for instance, the mineral waters, whether natural or artificial, on the free-list. It places articles of luxury on the free-list. It places, for instance, Apollinaris water on the free-list, which is simply an article of luxury, and only used by the wealthy as a superior table water. The manufacturers of Apollinaris water have this advantage over the American manufacturers of mineral water: the American manufacturer has to pay, in the first instance, a higher rate for wages.

That is conceded by everybody. The American manufacturer of mineral water has to pay 25 per cent. ad valorem on corks. I do not complain about the duty on corks; I simply state the facts. He also pays a duty on wire and labels. In addition to this advantage you give to the foreign manufacturer, you make the American manufacturer pay a duty of about 70 per cent. ad valorem on the bottles he uses, while you allow the foreign manufacturer to import his bottles under this bill at 30 per cent. ad valorem.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. I ask that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. GUENTHER] be allowed more time.

Mr. MILLS. I must object; he has had his five minutes.

Mr. GUENTHER. I only ask five minutes longer. This is a glaring inconsistency and it should be corrected. The inconsistency is that you place a duty of 1 per cent. ad valorem on the empty bottles and allow the same bottles filled with mineral water or some other substance to come in at 30 per cent. ad valorem. The difference is between 30 per cent. ad valorem and 70 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. The gentleman is entirely in error as to the facts.

Mr. GUENTHER. I have read the RECORD of two or three weeks ago, when Mr. MCMILLIN moved to strike out the paragraph, and it was kindly consented to pass it over to give me a chance to be heard, for which I am very thankful.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. The gentleman will find that it is not an ad valorem rate at all. It is a proposed specific duty.

Mr. GUENTHER. Ah! I read the RECORD and know what I am about.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. No; the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. GUENTHER. I so understand it, and the RECORD verifies my statement.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. That may be, but there may be an error in the RECORD in that respect. It is proposed in line 115 to change it to 1 cent per pound.

Mr. GUENTHER. Ah! On that very point I wish just here to say a word. I want to know why when the Mills bill came before the House in one form the committee found occasion to change it to another? The Mills bill as it came from the House placed the duty at three-quarters of a cent per pound, and I can not understand what change came over the spirit of their dreams to induce them to make such a remarkable change without assigning a reason for it.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Well, that is not a pending proposition for a vote of the House.

Mr. GUENTHER. No, but it is a question as to what caused this change in the minds of Democrats.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. The gentleman wants a political debate. I must decline most respectfully to indulge him in that wish at present.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas, which the Clerk will again report.

The amendment was again read.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Now, in line 115, in order to conform to that, I move to strike out "three-quarters" and insert "one."

Mr. GUENTHER. I want to be heard on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman in opposition.

Mr. GUENTHER. Mr. Chairman, about two or three months ago a petition came to this House signed by many hundreds of bottlers of liquor and beer—I do not care so much for that, for I do not use these articles very much [laughter]—and also by the bottlers of mineral waters (this is my favorite drink), asking that the proposed duty of the Mills bill of three-quarters of a cent per pound on empty bottles should be reduced to one-quarter of a cent per pound. Now, I was opposed to that reduction as being too large, but I believe that a duty of one-half cent a pound is sufficient, because that as a specific duty is about equivalent to a duty of 35 per cent. ad valorem.

And this is the same duty that was in force under the Morrill tariff, remember, up to 1883, but by some proceeding in conference committee it was changed. The deliberate action, however, of the House of Representatives and of the Senate in the Forty-seventh Congress in 1883 was to sustain and continue in force the old duty under the Morrill tariff.

Now the Mills bill came into this House and it put the duty at three-quarters of a cent a pound specific, which is 50 per cent. higher on bottles than under the Morrill tariff bill. I, as a protectionist, do not object so much to that, though I consider this duty too high as compared with that on other manufactures. I am willing that the glass-blowers should be protected; still, one-half a cent would do that.

Now, for the sake of information, I would like to know the reason why gentlemen, after deliberately going to work—for I infer, at least that is the presumption, that they have carefully considered these different items in the Committee on Ways and Means—why they should now go to work and change the rate of duty and place it at 1 cent per pound? Instead of lowering the duty as asked by the hundreds of bottlers, you raise it.

Mr. MILLS. We left it exactly where the Republican party did in the tariff of March 3, 1883.

Mr. GUENTHER. Who left it?

Mr. MILLS. You and your party. You explain why your party put it there, and you will have an answer to your own question.

Mr. GUENTHER. The gentleman was a member of the Forty-seventh Congress——

Mr. MILLS. I voted against it.

Mr. GUENTHER. The gentleman knows, having been a member of that Congress, that the deliberate action of the House of Representatives was to place a duty of 35 per cent. ad valorem, leaving it just as under the Morrill tariff; and the Senate put it down to 30.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. How did it get to be changed?

Mr. GUENTHER. By some hocus-pocus in conference committee. [Laughter.] I do not know how.

Mr. McMILLIN. And your side did that.

Mr. GUENTHER. We could not help ourselves; because, as the gentleman knows, it came here on March 3, one day prior to adjournment, and we could not help ourselves, but had to take it in the aggregate, and this provision had gotten into it by some means or other. But why should the incongruity remain? I do not charge that the Democratic party is responsible, and I claim that the Republican party is not responsible. It was perhaps one member of the conference committee, and one member does not constitute either the Republican or Democratic party. But I would like to know, and that is the point, what change came over you to so suddenly raise the duty from three-fourths of a cent to 1 cent without giving any explanation.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. The gentleman will find, if he looks, that this is not a higher ad valorem equivalent than prevails generally along in articles of glassware. If he will run his eye down the schedule he will find that to be the case.

Mr. GUENTHER. I know all about it. It is equivalent to 70 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. No, sir; 56 per cent.

Mr. GUENTHER. No, sir; 56 per cent. is the average on all the articles embraced in that schedule; but on glass bottles it is equivalent to 70 per cent.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. If the gentleman will look at the schedule——

Mr. GUENTHER. I do not care; I know it. I know all about these glass bottles. I looked the matter up with accuracy.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Very well.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, I now ask that we may have a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out from line 118, on page 13, to line 130, on page 14, inclusive.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Has that paragraph been read?

The CHAIRMAN. That was not passed over. It was considered.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the next paragraph that was passed over.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. What is the next paragraph?

The CLERK. The next paragraph is lines 135 to 141, inclusive, on page 14.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Before we get to that I have an amendment which comes in on line 133.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Amend on page 14, line 133, by striking out the word "fifteen" and inserting "twenty."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I offer another amendment, which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Amend on page 14, line 134, by striking out the words "twenty-five," and inserting "thirty."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, the pending amendment now at the desk relates to what lines?

The CHAIRMAN. To lines 135 to 141.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Let that paragraph be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Unpolished cylinder, crown, and common window glass, not exceeding 10 by 15 inches square, 1 cent per pound; above that, and not exceeding 16 by 24 inches square, 1½ cents per pound; above that, and not exceeding 24 by 30 inches square, 1¾ cents per pound; all above that, 1¾ cents per pound.

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment pending to strike out in line 140 the words "one and one-half," and insert "two;" and also to strike out "one and three-fourths," in line 141, and insert "two and a half."

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I send to the desk an amendment to come in ahead of the first of those.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 14, by striking out, in line 136, the words "one cent" and inserting "one and three-eighths cents."

Mr. DINGLEY. I would like to have some explanation of this increase of the "tax."

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. This is simply a restoration of the present law.

Mr. DINGLEY. But I thought it was proposed by your bill to reduce the tax now resting on the consumer.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. This is the exact rate that is in the present law; and as to that general proposition, I do not see that it is involved in this detail.

Mr. REED. The consumer is interested in it.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. But the distinguished gentleman from Maine does not represent the consumer. [Laughter.]

Mr. REED. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] proposes to raise the amount of the tariff tax upon this article above what it was in the original bill, and when I ask him what the reasons are which induce him thus to impose upon the consumer, repeating some things which he has repeated so often during this debate, he replies that I do not represent the consumer. Now, I think the gentleman said that in perfect sincerity. I think he has the idea that gentlemen on our side of the House do not represent both sides of this question, and I think he made the statement in perfect good faith.

It is part and parcel of the fallacy which has governed this whole bill; part and parcel of the fallacy that is attempted to be foisted upon this country, that one side of this Chamber alone represents the consumer. As I have already pointed out, and as every man of sense knows, this nation is made up, all parts of it, of consumers and of producers, and everybody knows that the only consumers who are not really producers are the sole class that this bill can by possibility benefit, namely, men who are living upon fortunes already accumulated, with incomes that are fixed from the very nature of their fortunes.

All the rest of the consumers of this country are thoroughly interested in the question of production, because they are producers, and their means of consumption depend upon what they are able to gain by producing articles for themselves and the rest of the community to use.

Now, there has been a statement continuously made on this side [the Democratic side, on which Mr. REED was standing] that all these things are tariff taxes; that they are nothing but taxes; and the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] has used that phraseology more than any other man on this side of the Chamber. He has taken a peculiar pride and pleasure in forming his lips over the words "tariff taxes;" yet he comes here and, with no explanation except a jest, proposes to change the deliberate judgment of his committee as to what was due to the consumer by adopting the old tariff which he has again and again denounced. Now, I do not imagine he would give the House any explanation of this; but there is not a man sitting here who does not know that the only explanation he can really give consistently with any one of his former declarations must be a political reason. I should like to see him have the manliness to avow that that is the object, and that he is using the laws of the United States for political purposes, and not for industrial and economic reasons. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I suppose it would hardly be profitable or satisfactory to the House for the gentleman from Maine and myself to get into a general political discussion at this time. He will find that of the amendments I am now offering, every one provides for a substantial reduction of the tax, except the one which was just offered. That one leaves the duty upon the article in question at a less rate than the majority of the other articles following it and belonging to the same schedule. That the gentleman might have found out while looking for "industrial reasons."

But the gentleman seems to have gotten upon his feet for the purpose of falling into a line of errors. I did not say that nobody on the other side was a representative of consumers. I do not believe that his side of the House represents consumers in the way that this side of the House considers to their best interests. My remark related solely to the gentleman from Maine, that he was not a representative of consumers; and he makes a mistake when he assumes that he is the entire side of the House with which he aligns himself; and when he stood on our side he got decidedly on the wrong side of the House to undertake to appropriate to himself the position of being one of the sides of this House.

Now, let us have a vote.

Mr. REED. I call the attention of the House again for a moment to the fact that even in this proposition, so thoroughly inconsistent with the language which has been used on the other side, no answer is vouchsafed to us giving the reasons for the proposed change. It is a part and parcel of the whole system which has been adopted throughout on this bill—a bill geographical, political, but in no sense economic. I take this last opportunity to reiteratingly call the attention of the House to the method which has been adopted, and the utter lack of information from gentlemen on the other side. It is plain that they are acting for political reasons. I have made the distinct charge against them; and the gentleman from Arkansas, who is naturally a straightforward man, and practically so, has not taken occasion to deny it.

The charge was made in a full House; and he no more denied it than did the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee his free-trade speech of four years ago. I do not believe with regard to the gentleman from Arkansas that even the distance of New York would make him derogate from his position on this subject. He has had two opportunities which I have known—one this very afternoon, and one at the time when the chairman's speech of four years ago was brought up—to deny that he was a free-trader and meant free trade, and he has not availed himself of either opportunity. Gentlemen on the other side have been charged this afternoon and now with making this amendment and other amendments affecting the industries of this country for political reasons and political purposes, and there was not one word of denial.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE]. If there be no objection, it will be considered as agreed to. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. On page 14, line 138, I move to strike out "one and one-fourth" and insert "one and five-eighths;" so it will read: "1⅝ cents per pound."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I believe there is an amendment pending in line 141 to strike out——

The CHAIRMAN. That amendment has already been agreed to.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. When was it agreed to?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair put the question to the committee, and there was no objection.

Mr. SOWDEN. I desire to call the attention of the committee to the fact that when the metal schedule was under consideration there were very few members present when the vote was taken on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCKINLEY], to insert "seventy-two" after the word "six," in line 156, on page 15. I therefore ask unanimous consent to move to amend by striking out line 156.

Mr. MILLS. I have no objection, provided there is no debate and the vote is taken at once.

Mr. SOWDEN. I move to strike out line 156, on page 15, and ask the Clerk to read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Iron in pigs, iron kentledge, $6 per ton.

A MEMBER. What is it now?

Mr. SOWDEN. If this line is struck out it will leave the duty as it is under the present law, $6.72 per ton.

The question was put to the committee.

Mr. SOWDEN demanded a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 79, noes 84.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. SOWDEN. I now ask unanimous consent to move to amend line 161, on page 15, by striking out "$11" and inserting "$15;" so that the paragraph will read: "Steel railway bars and railway bars made in part of steel, weighing more than 25 pounds to the yard, $15 per ton," the words "and slabs and billets of steel" having already been stricken out.

Mr. MILLS. I object to going back.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the next paragraph to the bill which has been passed over.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I desire to move to strike out the paragraph beginning at line 135, which is as follows:

Unpolished cylinder, crown, and common window glass, not exceeding 10 by 15 inches square, 1 cent per pound; above that, and not exceeding 16 by 24 inches square, 1¼ cents per pound; above that, and not exceeding 24 by 30 inches square, 1½ cents per pound; all above that, 1¾ cents per pound.

Mr. MILLS. We have passed by that, and I object.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I wish to have read some petitions which I have received.

Mr. MILLS. I call for the regular order.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I asked recognition in time and before we had passed over that paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. We have passed to another matter.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I know we have, but that was done by unanimous consent.

I only wish to say to the committee that I hold in my hand a bundle of petitions embracing the names of several hundred workingmen now employed in glass factories in my district who are not only protesting against the passage of the Mills bill, but who are asking for a restoration of the duties as they existed prior to the year 1883. I desire to say that the revenues have been largely increased by that reduction.

I shall ask leave to print a letter which will fully explain the situation of this industry. I call the attention of the committee to the immense increase of importations and consequent increase of duties since the reduction of the duty in 1883. Since this reduction of duty the imports have been swelled many millions of dollars, and more than $1,000,000 has been added to the surplus, and the wages of the workingmen have been materially reduced. The most earnest appeals have been made, not only by the manufacturers of window-glass, but by the workingmen engaged in this great industry, to this House to restore the former duty, which experience has shown to be absolutely necessary to the prosperity of this industry and to the well-being of all who are engaged in it. There is no reason why all the window-glass that we use in this country should not be made by our own people. The letter to which I have referred I shall hand to the Clerk and ask to have it printed with my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has that right under general leave.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. The petitions I shall not print, but file with the committee.

The following is the letter referred to in the remarks of Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR:

PITTSBURGH, PA., March 30, 1888.

I herewith submit to you a statement in relation to the tariff on window-glass, and reasons why it should not be reduced as proposed by Mills bill, as reported by the Ways and Means Committee.

First. The present tariff schedule on common window-glass was adopted in 1842. At that time 24 by 30 inches in common window-glass was as large as was made anywhere in the world, while at the present time there is common window-glass made as large as 50 by 76 inches, and the schedule that would apply to common window-glass forty-six years ago will not answer as a criterion in determining as to what is a just and fair measure at the present time, the surroundings of the case are so much changed in the period of forty-six years.

Second. There was a reduction of the tariff on window glass in 1883, and since the reduction the importation of window glass has increased very materially, thereby increasing the revenue in the Treasury from this source.

Third. The workingmen engaged in this branch of industry have had to work for less wages in consequence of the reduction of the tariff in 1883, and from the large increase in the imported article and the cheapness of the same. Even at the present time, with the present duty, one-fourth of the glass consumed in this country is imported from Europe. It is but natural to suppose that with a decrease in the duty that these imports would increase, and also, as a natural result, the imported article would displace that made at home, and must of necessity cause the workmen to lay idle, or suffer a further reduction in order to meet the competition from the imported article.

Fourth. The wages in Europe in this industry are exceedingly low. Two years ago, while passing through Belgium on a tour of observation in the interest of the window-glass workers' organization, I saw women wheeling in coal, carrying in glass in the sheet. Their wages ranged from $2 to $3 per week, while here in America this class of work is performed by men whose wages range from $9 to $12 per week; and about the same ratio of difference prevails in all the skilled branches of the industry between the prices paid in Europe and America. I feel, in view of this fact, that with a reduction of 35 per cent. as proposed by the Mills bill, the difference will have to be met by a large reduction in the matter of wages by the workmen in the window-glass industry of this country.

In the annual report of the chief of the bureau of imported merchandise for the years 1886 and 1887 you will find the following statement of the importation of window-glass for the year 1887: Glass of the dimensions of 10 by 15 inches amounted to 14,117,875 pounds, valued at $319,798.94; value per unit quantity, .023; ad valorem rate, 60.71. The price of the glass of the 10 by 15 inches ranges from $9.50 up to $14.50 per box. The amount imported in the class that runs from 24 by 30 inches up to 50 by 76 was 17,608,435 pounds, valued at $466,603.55; value per unit of quantity, .026; ad valorem rate, 108⅛.

The price of the glass in the 24 by 30 inches up to 50 by 76 ranges from $15 up to $76 and upwards per box. The value of unit of quantity in the 10 by 15 inches is 2.3 cents, and the price does not go above $14.50. The 24 by 30 inches up to 50 by 76 is valued at 2.6 cents, which only makes a difference of three-tenths cents per value, while the price runs from $15 to upwards of $76 above. There is imported of the class of 24 by 30 inches up to 50 by 76, 3,490,560 pounds more than there was of the 10 by 15 inch grade, and is only valued at $146,804.61 more than the cheaper glass. For what reason it is done no one can dispute; it is undervaluation in order to make the ad valorem duty higher.

If the Mills bill should become a law, with the low wages in Europe, the cheapness of ocean freights between Europe and America, with a 35 per cent. reduction in the tariff duties, there will be no other alternative for the American workmen but to accept a reduction in wages or surrender the market to the goods imported from abroad.

As before stated, more than one-fourth of the window-glass consumed in this country is imported, and from the above statement of facts there is no doubt but what the tariff should be increased in order to better foster and protect home industry.

These facts that I have stated I feel can not be successfully controverted, and I submit them to you for your careful consideration.

I remain yours, respectfully,

JAMES CAMPBELL,
President of the Window-Glass Workers' Association of America.

Hon. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR,
Washington, D. C.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the next paragraph passed over.

The Clerk read as follows:

All tobacco in leaf, manufactured, and not stemmed, 35 cents per pound.

The CHAIRMAN. The pending amendment is that of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] to strike out that paragraph.

[Mr. BUTTERWORTH withholds his remarks for revision. See APPENDIX.]

[Mr. CAREY withholds his remarks for revision. See APPENDIX.]

Mr. LA FOLLETTE addressed the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I wish to perfect the paragraph before the motion to strike out is acted upon. I move to substitute what I send to the desk for the lines under consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out lines 362 and 363 inclusive, and insert instead:

"All leaf-tobacco contained in any package, bale, box, or in bulk, or shipped in any form whatsoever, any part or portion of which is suitable for wrappers, if not stemmed, 75 cents per pound; if stemmed, $1 per pound, on the whole contents of such package, bale, box, or bulk of tobacco."

[Mr. LA FOLLETTE addressed the Committee. His remarks (withheld for revision) appear in full in the succeeding day's proceedings.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The committee will rise informally to receive a message from the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments, a bill (H. R. 6153) to authorize the condemnation of land for sites of public buildings, requested a conference on the bill and amendments, and had appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. SPOONER, Mr. VEST, and Mr. PASCO.

TARIFF.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the pending amendment is exhausted.

Mr. STRUBLE. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] asked unanimous consent for five minutes' additional time.

Several members on the Democratic side objected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

Mr. MCKENNA. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, in order to give my time to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

The CHAIRMAN. No further amendment is in order, there being an amendment to an amendment now pending.

Mr. MILLS. I hope we shall have a vote on this paragraph now.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion to strike out this paragraph and insert the words which the Clerk has read.

The amendment of Mr. LA FOLLETTE was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs upon the motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] to strike out this paragraph.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard upon that.

Mr. MILLS. I move that the committee rise to close debate upon this paragraph.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 82, noes 64.

So the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. MCCREARY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SPRINGER, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that they had had under consideration a bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. MILLS. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of bills raising revenue; and, pending that motion, I move that all debate upon the pending paragraph be closed in one minute, and on that I demand the previous question.

Mr. MCKINLEY. I move to amend so as to make the time six minutes.

Mr. MILLS. You can not do it. I have demanded the previous question.

Mr. MCKINLEY. I wish to say to the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means that I think he will save time by letting the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] have the time he desires.

Mr. MILLS. I will not.

Mr. MCKINLEY. The gentleman from Wisconsin wants only five minutes.

Mr. MILLS. I have yielded to every request made on that side of the House.

Mr. MCKINLEY. This is a very important matter, and I think the gentleman from Wisconsin should have five minutes longer.

Mr. MCCULLOGH. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MCCULLOGH. What is the paragraph under consideration?

The SPEAKER. The present occupant of the chair does not preside in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. MCCULLOGH. Well, the report is made to the House, and I make the point that there is no paragraph pending before the House.

The SPEAKER. The paragraph under consideration in Committee of the Whole is what the motion refers to. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The question was taken; and the Speaker declared that the ayes seemed to have it.

A division was called for.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 83, noes 2.

Mr. MCKINLEY. No quorum.

Mr. MILLS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. MCKINLEY. It does seem to me that if the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] will give the gentleman from Wisconsin five minutes more he will save time. That is all we ask.

Mr. MILLS. I have extended courtesies to that side of the House from the beginning of this debate, and they have not been returned, and I will not now yield to a demand for an unconditional surrender. [Jeers on the Republican side.]

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 121, nays 2, not voting 201; as follows:

Mr. MCKINLEY (during the first roll-call) said: In order that we may make some progress, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the further call of the roll, and that five minutes be granted to this side to discuss the question under consideration in Committee of the Whole. [Cries of "Regular order!"] This roll-call will occupy some twenty-five minutes. All we are asking is five minutes. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The roll-call was then continued.

Mr. CANNON (at the conclusion of the first roll-call) said: I want to ask as a compromise that four minutes be given to this side.

Mr. MILLS and others. Regular order.

The call of the roll was resumed and concluded

Mr. BLAND. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the names.

Mr. HOPKINS, of New York. I object.

The names were recapitulated.

Mr. PENINGTON. I am paired with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HIESTAND]. Having voted to make a quorum, I desire to withdraw my vote, inasmuch as I understand there is not a quorum voting.

The following-named members were announced as paired on all political questions until further notice:

Mr. DAVIDSON, of Florida, with Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania.
Mr. BELMONT with Mr. DAVENPORT.
Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, with Mr. BUTTERWORTH.
Mr. BURNES with Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa.
Mr. BIGGS with Mr. FELTON.
Mr. GLOVER with Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana.
Mr. GRANGER with Mr. HOUK.
Mr. CATCHINGS with Mr. COGSWELL.
Mr. RUSK with Mr. SPOONER.
Mr. COLLINS with Mr. DUNHAM.
Mr. PIDCOCK with Mr. DE LANO.
Mr. TIMOTHY J. CAMPBELL with Mr. BELDEN.
Mr. GREENMAN with Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois.
Mr. MCKINLEY with Mr. SCOTT.
Mr. PENINGTON with Mr. HIESTAND.
Mr. PERRY with Mr. HAYDEN.
Mr. CRISP with Mr. ROWELL.

The following-named members were announced as paired for this day:

Mr. RAYNER with Mr. MCCOMAS.

Mr. O'FERRALL with Mr. FUNSTON.
Mr. OUTHWAITE with Mr. SYMES.
Mr. HATCH with Mr. PUGSLEY.
Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia, with Mr. KELLEY.
Mr. BARRY with Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana.

Mr. ERMENTROUT with Mr. GAINES.
Mr. WHITING, of Michigan, with Mr. PARKER.
Mr. CHIPMAN with Mr. BROWER.
Mr. ANDERSON, of Mississippi, with Mr. PETERS.

The SPEAKER. On this question the yeas are 121, the noes 2. No quorum has voted.

Mr. MCKINLEY. I renew my request that five minutes be allowed on this side.

Mr. MILLS. Is the point made that no quorum voted?

The SPEAKER. The record shows no quorum.

Mr. MILLS. Then, Mr. Speaker, as by prior order of the House to-night was set apart for business of the Committee on Labor, I move that the House take a recess until 8 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The House can not take a recess in the absence of a quorum. The Journal of the House, which contains its official proceedings, shows that there is no quorum present.

Mr. MILLS. I move, then, that the House adjourn.

Mr. REED. If the gentleman wants to waste the afternoon, there is nothing to prevent him; he has the majority with him.

The SPEAKER (having put the question on the motion to adjourn). The Chair is unable to decide.

Mr. REED. I call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that if a count should be taken on the pending motion, and a quorum should appear, it would obviate the difficulty. If the House, by the vote of a quorum, should decide not to adjourn, it could then take a recess. But the yeas and nays are demanded.

Mr. REED. Then I withdraw the call.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman withdraws the demand for the yeas and nays till after the count.

Mr. REED. Yes, sir.

The question being again taken on the motion to adjourn, there were—ayes 85, noes 76.

Mr. WARNER. I call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. Not one-fifth has voted in the affirmative.

Several MEMBERS. Count the other side.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 25, noes 71.

So (one-fifth voting in favor thereof) the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MILLS. I will withdraw my motion to adjourn and move to take a recess.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. MILLS. I move to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were ordered.

Several MEMBERS. Division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 72, noes 2.

So the motion to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were ordered was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on ordering the yeas and nays.

Mr. WARNER. I withdraw the demand for the yeas and nays on the condition that the evening session shall be saved for the Labor Committee.

Mr. REED. We should allow Mr. LA FOLLETTE to have his five minutes, and thereupon we can take a recess so as to allow the Labor Committee to have their evening session.

Mr. MILLS. I move the House take a recess.

The SPEAKER. Want of a quorum has been disclosed by the count.

Mr. MILLS. I withdraw the motion to adjourn at any rate. The Labor Committee have to-night.

The SPEAKER. The House stands adjourned unless by unanimous consent the gentleman withdraws his motion to adjourn.

Mr. MILLS. I do withdraw my motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [Cries of "Object!" and "Too late!"]

Mr. SOWDEN. I demand tellers on the motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The point is made that it is too late, as the result has been announced, and therefore the House stands adjourned.

Accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

And the said court shall proceed with the same in accordance with the provisions of such acts, and report to the Senate in accordance therewith.

FORT HALL RESERVATION.

Mr. DAWES. I am instructed by the Committee on Indian Affairs to report back with an amendment the bill (H. R. 8662) to accept and ratify an agreement made with the Shoshone and Bannack Indians, for the surrender and relinquishment to the United States of a portion of the Fort Hall reservation, in the Territory of Idaho, for the purposes of a town site, and for the grant of right of way through said reservation to the Utah and Northern Railway Company, and for other purposes. It is the same bill which passed the Senate some time since except a small amendment that was introduced in the Senate, which while the House were unable to get hold of the Senate bill they were very desirous of incorporating into their bill. Therefore I take the liberty of asking the Senate to pass the House bill with that amendment added at this time.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs was, in section 11, line 16, after the word "Interior," to insert:

Except that at and near its station at Pocatello, in Idaho Territory, said railway company is granted for its use for station grounds, depot buildings, shops, tracks, side-tracks, turnouts, yards, and for water purposes, not to exceed 150 acres, as shown by maps and plats of the definite location thereof, and said company shall pay for said 150 acres, in addition to the $8 an acre provided in said agreement, a further sum equal to the average appraisal of each acre of town lots in the proposed town site of Pocatello, outside of said 150 acres provided for in section 4 of this act, said $8 per acre to be paid within one year from the passage of this act, and said additional sum upon the completion of the appraisement aforesaid.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The section proposed to be stricken out will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out the following section:

SEC. 17. That this act shall be in force from its passage.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am directed by the Committee on Printing to report back adversely the joint resolution (S. R. 94) providing for printing additional copies of the eighth and ninth annual reports of the Director of the United States Geological Survey, and in lieu thereof to report a concurrent resolution to the same effect, for which I ask present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the joint resolution will be indefinitely postponed. The concurrent resolution reported by the Senator from Nebraska will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the concurrent resolution, as follows:

Concurrent resolution to authorize the printing of additional copies of the eighth and ninth annual reports of the Director of the United States Geological Survey.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed at the Government Printing Office, in addition to the number already ordered by law, 15,500 copies of the eighth and ninth annual reports of the Director of the United States Geological Survey, uniform with the preceding volumes of the series, of which 3,500 of each shall be for the use of the Senate, 7,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 5,000 for distribution by the Geological Survey.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the concurrent resolution?

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

REPORTS ON ETHNOLOGY.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 93) providing for printing the eighth and ninth annual reports of the Director of the Bureau of Ethnology, to report it adversely, with the recommendation that it be indefinitely postponed, and in lieu thereof I report a concurrent resolution, and ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The adverse report will be agreed to if there be no objection, and the joint resolution will be indefinitely postponed. The concurrent resolution reported by the Senator from Nebraska will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Concurrent resolution to provide for printing the eighth and ninth annual reports of the Director of the Bureau of Ethnology.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed at the Government Printing Office 15,500 copies each of the eighth and ninth annual reports of the Director of the Bureau of Ethnology, with accompanying papers and illustrations, and uniform with the preceding volumes of the series, of which 3,500 shall be for the use of the Senate, 7,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 5,000 for distribution by the Bureau of Ethnology.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. REAGAN. I was requested by W. Hawkins, delegate for the Chickasaw Indians, to present a paper which I submit as an amendment to the deficiency appropriation bill and ask its reference to the Committee on Appropriations. I desire to say that the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury of December 20, 1887, shows that the amount which he believed to be due to the Chickasaws is $240,164.58. The letter of the Secretary of the Treasury of January 5, of this year, submits the estimate of an appropriation for the amount due to the Chickasaw Indians. I propose to refer with the amendment House Executive Document No. 42, first session Fiftieth Congress. I ask that both be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed. Does the Senator desire to have the accompanying document printed?

Mr. REAGAN. No, sir. I do not know that it will be necessary to print the amendment. Let it be referred simply.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order to print will not be made.

Mr. BLAIR submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COURTS IN DAKOTA.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10573) to provide for one additional associate justice of the supreme court of Dakota, and for other purposes.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to the consideration of the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That hereafter the supreme court of the Territory of Dakota shall consist of a chief-justice and seven associate justices, any five of whom shall constitute a quorum.

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of the President to appoint two additional associate justices of said supreme court in manner now provided by law, who shall hold their offices for the term of four years and until their successors are appointed and qualified.

SEC. 3. Each judge, after assignment, shall reside in the district to which he is assigned.

SEC. 12. That no justice of the supreme court of said Territory shall sit as a member of said court at the trial of any question decided by him in his district or wherein he has any interest directly or indirectly.

SEC. 13. That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to prevent the legislative assembly of said Territory at any time from changing and arranging the boundary lines of the judicial districts of said Territory, nor from fixing the time and place of holding the several terms of court in said district.

SEC. 14. That all offenses committed before the passage of this act shall be prosecuted, tried, and determined in the same manner and with the same effect (except as to the number of judges) as if this act had not been passed.

SEC. 15. That all unorganized counties lying west of said eighth judicial district are hereby annexed, for judicial purposes, to the sixth judicial district of said Territory.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I move that the Senate request a conference with the House of Representatives upon the bill and amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, Mr. EVARTS, and Mr. VEST were appointed.

POSTAL CRIMES.

Mr. VEST. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 3303) amendatory of "An act relating to postal crimes, and amendatory of the statutes therein mentioned," approved June 18, 1888.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to amend the act of June 18, 1888, so as to provide that all matter otherwise mailable by law, upon the envelope, or outside cover or wrapper of which, or upon any part of which, either exterior or interior, or postal card, upon which indecent, lewd, lascivious, obscene, libelous, scurrilous, defamatory, or threatening delineations, epithets, terms, or language, or reflecting injuriously upon the character or conduct of another, may be written or printed, are hereby declared to be non-mailable matter, and shall not be conveyed in the mails, nor delivered from any post-office nor by any letter-carrier; and any person who shall knowingly deposit or cause to be deposited, for mailing or delivery, anything declared herein to be non-mailable matter, and any person who shall knowingly take the same or cause the same to be taken from the mails, for the purpose of circulating or disposing of, or of aiding in the circulation or disposition of the same, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, for each and every offense, be fined not less than $100 nor more than $5,000, or imprisoned at hard labor not less than one year nor more than ten years, or both, at the discretion of the court.

Mr. HAWLEY. It occurs to me from just listening to the bill as it was read that the penalty is very severe; that the minimum penalty is larger than necessary.

Mr. VEST. That is the penalty under the existing law. There is no change in the punishment. The bill is simply to enlarge the scope and operation of the law. I had occasion the other day to explain this matter, if the Senator did me the honor to hear me.

Mr. HAWLEY. I heard the Senator make that explanation.

Mr. VEST. This is the same punishment prescribed in the general statute. There is no change in the penalty at all.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CONSIDERATION OF THE CALENDAR.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I rose to move that the Senate proceed to the Calendar under Rule VIII, at the point where we left off in the regular call the last time it was under consideration, and that we continue with the Calendar until 2 o'clock. There are half a dozen bills that I am urged by members of the House of Representatives to have passed if I possibly can. I can not very properly ask to have precedence given to them over everything else, but if we keep up the regular call of the Calendar we shall all get our cases through with something like fair play, whereas if we try to get bills in wherever we can it will not be fair to those who can not be present. I can not be here very much of the time; I have been ten days in committee now; and those who happen to be here will get bills in unless we proceed regularly with the Calendar.

Mr. SAWYER. I hope the Senate will adopt the suggestion of the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BECK. It is the only proper way to dispose of the business on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Calendar under Rule VIII and continue its consideration until 2 o'clock. Is there objection?

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I suggest to the Senator from Kentucky to propose to continue the order from day to day until the Calendar is gone through with.

Mr. BECK. I should be glad to do that, but perhaps that would not be acceded to.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I think it would be agreed to unanimously.

Mr. BECK. I should be very glad if it could be done.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. After the morning business each day, until 2 o'clock, let us proceed with the Calendar.

Mr. BECK. I will accept the Senator's suggestion. I ask that the order be made to continue from day to day until the Calendar is gone through with.

Mr. PLATT. I should not like to agree to that. We may have business which would make it necessary to supersede such an order.

Mr. BECK. I was afraid of that. Therefore I will simply ask that the Calendar be proceeded with to-day until 2 o'clock.

Mr. VEST. That ought to be done. There are a number of bridge bills on the Calendar. It is necessary to pass them, and I was about to ask when the Senator from Kentucky took the floor that the Senate devote whatever may be left of the morning hour to-morrow and the next day to the consideration of bridge bills exclusively; but if this is made a continuing order of course I do not care about any such arrangement. We always have the power at any time, if exigencies arise, to change our order of business. If the Senator from Kentucky would modify his request so that we can go through the Calendar regularly, it would be perfectly fair to everybody; and at any time we could set that order aside.

Mr. PLATT. I do not suppose I would object to it to-morrow or any other day; yet I do not want to restrain the Senate from considering some important matter to-morrow if it should be deemed necessary.

Mr. VEST. I hope the order will be made to continue the Calendar from day to day, and then we can change it if necessary.

Mr. CULLOM. It is proposed to consider the Calendar until 2 o'clock?

Mr. VEST. Until 2 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That does not require any order, because it is the rule of the Senate already.

Mr. VEST. Then let us enforce it.

Mr. BROWN. Let us have the rule enforced.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. But it is in the power of any Senator to move to proceed to the consideration of a bill notwithstanding the requirement of Rule VIII. The Senator from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Calendar under Rule VIII this morning, and continue the consideration until 2 o'clock. Is there objection?

Mr. BROWN. I object to that.

Mr. STEWART. I hope that will not be done.

Mr. BROWN. I object, because I think it is only fair to continue with the Calendar in this way from day to day until all have a chance.

Mr. BECK. I propose that we shall have an hour for the Calendar to-day, and we can continue it from day to day, unless there is objection.

Mr. BROWN. The rule as announced by the Chair is that the Calendar is now in order, and we can go on to-day without any motion.

Mr. BECK. We can do that every day without a motion.

Mr. BROWN. Very well; I want the Senate to do that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will recognize the Senator from Kentucky to move the consideration of any bill he desires on the Calendar.

Mr. COCKRELL. I call for the regular order, the Calendar.

Mr. BROWN. Let us have the regular order.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope the regular order will now be proceeded with.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to dispose of a matter of privilege, which will take but a moment, before the Calendar is proceeded with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire will state his matter of privilege.

SENATOR FROM LOUISIANA.

Mr. CHANDLER. I desire to call up the resolution which is on the table with regard to the credentials of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON], and their reference to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, to substitute another resolution therefor, to be printed and lie over, and to allow the credentials to be disposed of in the regular course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair supposes the Senator from New Hampshire would have the right, before action by the Senate, to modify his own resolution. The Chair hears no objection. The modification of the resolution will be read, if any Senator desires. Otherwise, it will be printed and lie over under the rule.

Mr. CHANDLER. I offer the resolution for that purpose.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be printed and lie over under the rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be printed and lie over under the rule.

Mr. CHANDLER. I desire, instead of its being printed and lying over under the rule, that it be printed and laid on the table, and I give notice that I shall move to take it up some time next week.

The resolution as modified was ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections be instructed to inquire (1) into the facts of the recent election in the State of Louisiana, held on the 17th day of April, 1888, at which there were chosen State officers and also a Legislature which has since elected two United States Senators; and specially to ascertain and report whether the 136,746 votes returned for the candidate of the dominant party for governor were actually cast, in view of the fact that at no previous election had the votes for such candidate of such party exceeded 88,794; and also why in the parish of Madison there were returned 3,530 votes for one party and none for the other; in East Feliciana Parish, 2,276 for one party and only 5 for the other; in Morehouse Parish, 1,584 for one party and only 14 for the other; in Ouachita Parish, 2,994 for one party and only 5 for the other; in Sabine Parish, 1,441 for one party and only 2 for the other; in Tensas Parish, 4,627 for one party and only 113 for the other; and why there were similar returns from other parishes; and also to ascertain and report whether or not at said State election there was any violence, intimidation, or fraud which prevented a fair election, and particularly whether or not there were any false canvasses or false returns made by the local election officers or included in the final canvass of the votes; and in case said committee shall find that such illegalities as violence, intimidation, or fraud, false canvasses, or false returns prevailed in connection with such election, then said committee shall further inquire

2. Whether any of the acts or omissions of the officials or other persons responsible for or connected with such illegalities were contrary to the Constitution of the United States or the amendments thereof, or were violations of any of the statutes of the United States, especially the provisions of chapter 7, Title LXX of the Revised Statutes, punishing crimes against the elective franchise and civil rights of citizens; and, if so, whether any prosecutions have been or ought to be commenced in the United States courts for such offenses.

3. Whether such illegalities are likely to be repeated in connection with the election to be held in said State on the 6th of November next of Representatives in Congress; and, if so, whether there is occasion for the alteration by Congress of any of the regulations prescribed by said State for holding elections for such Representatives in Congress.

4. And said committee shall also inquire whether there were in connection with the aforesaid State election illegalities, frauds, false canvasses, and false returns, so extensive and systematic in their character as to show that there existed on the part of the various State election officers a deliberate plan to apparently carry said election without regard to the votes actually cast, and to choose a governor and other State officers and a State Legislature by such illegal, false, and fraudulent means, and, if so, whether said Legislature was actually and duly elected by the people of Louisiana, or was in fact substantially the creation solely of the returning and canvassing officers, and whether said State of Louisiana has a republican form of government, including a Legislature entitled to choose United States Senators, and to provide methods for the appointment of electors of President and Vice-President of the United States.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Under the modification of the resolution as made by the Senator from New Hampshire I move that the credentials therein referred to of the Senator-elect from Louisiana be placed upon the files of the Senate and printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They are already on file, the Chair thinks.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Does that carry the order to print?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is unable to state definitely about these particlar credentials, but the uniform practice is to have credentials read when presented, and they are then placed upon the files of the Senate.

Mr. CHANDLER. The credentials were laid on the table, I think, on the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER].

Mr. BLACKBURN. The credentials were laid on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair presumes there will be no objection to their being printed in the RECORD.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I simply ask that the credentials be taken from the table, placed on the files of the Senate, and be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. CHANDLER. There is no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no objection, and it is so ordered.

Mr. MANDERSON. I happened to be the occupant of the chair at the time the credentials were presented, and I will state the course pursued. The credentials were read, and by reason of being read, were of course printed in the RECORD. Then on motion of some Senator they were laid on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed by the Official Reporter that they were not printed in full in the RECORD.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Such is my information.

Mr. MANDERSON. The credentials were not referred or placed on the files of the Senate, but were laid upon the table at that time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the credentials will be printed in full in the RECORD, and placed on the files of the Senate.

The credentials are as follows:

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT, STATE OF LOUISIANA.

To the President of the Senate of the United States:

I, Francis Tillou Nicholls, governor of the State of Louisiana, do hereby certify that Randall Lee Gibson, of the city of New Orleans, in this State, a duly qualified person under the Constitution of the United States, has been duly elected a Senator in Congress from the said State, for the term of six years commencing on the 4th day of March, 1889; that pursuant to the provisions of an act of Congress entitled "An act to regulate the time and manner of holding elections for Senators in Congress," approved July 25, 1866, the General Assembly of the State of Louisiana, which was chosen at the general election held on the 17th day of April, 1888, for the constitutional term of four years, and being the Legislature chosen next preceding the expiration of the Senatorial term which ends on the 4th day of March, 1889, proceeded on Tuesday, the 22d day of May, 1888 (it being the second Tuesday after the meeting and organization thereof), in their respective chambers, a quorum being present in each, by a viva voce vote to name a person for Senator for the term aforesaid; that a ballot was taken in the senate on the day aforesaid, when it appeared that the Honorable Randall Lee Gibson received 33 votes; and that on the same day a ballot was also taken in the house of representatives, when it appeared that the Honorable Randall Lee Gibson received 89 votes, and the Honorable Henry Demas received 1 vote; that at 12 o'clock meridian, upon the following day, being Wednesday, the 24th day of May, 1888, the same day, month, and year as above stated, the members of the two houses of the General Assembly of this State, convened in joint session, in the hall of the house of representatives, at the State House, in the city of Baton Rouge, in this State, and the journal of each house was read showing the votes cast on the day previous, whereupon the president of the senate declared that the Honorable Randall Lee Gibson having received a majority of the votes of the members of both houses of the General Assembly of this State, was declared duly elected Senator to represent the State of Louisiana in the United States Senate for the term beginning on the 4th day of March, 1889.

Therefore, I do hereby certify that Randall Lee Gibson was declared duly elected Senator in Congress for the State of Louisiana for the term of six years, commencing on and to date from the 4th day of March, 1889.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand as governor of the State of Louisiana, and caused the seal of the State to be hereunto affixed. Done at the city of Baton Rouge this 31st day of May, A. D. 1888.

FRANCIS T. NICHOLLS, Governor of Louisiana.

By the governor:
[SEAL.] L. F. MASON, Secretary of State.

DAVID MERIWETHER.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. The Senate some time since passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 331) for the relief of David Meriwether, which had previously passed the House of Representatives. The House has refused to concur in the amendments and has asked for a conference. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments and agree to the request for a conference.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. SPOONER, Mr. HOAR, and Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, were appointed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DOLPH. I move to take up for present consideration the bill (S. 3304) to prohibit the coming of Chinese laborers to the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate has just agreed by unanimous consent to proceed until 2 o'clock with the consideration of the Calendar under Rule VIII.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let us proceed under that rule.

PUNISHMENT OF RAPE.

Mr. FAULKNER. When the Senate was on the regular call of the Calendar under Rule VIII I was absent the morning the bill (H. R. 870) to amend the Revised Statutes relating to the District of Columbia or the protection of girls and for the punishment of the crime of rape was reached. According to a request I made previous to my leaving, the bill was passed over, but no objection was made to its consideration. I suggest that that case be called in commencing with the Calendar to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order of business to which the Senator refers is the point last reached when the Calendar was under consideration under Rule VIII; and it will now be read.

The bill (H. R. 5870) to amend the Revised Statutes relating to the District of Columbia, for the protection of girls and for the punishment of the crime of rape, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That every person who shall carnally and unlawfully know any female under the age of sixteen years, or who shall be accessory to such carnal and unlawful knowledge before the fact, shall be guilty of rape, and when convicted thereof shall be punished by imprisonment at hard labor, for the first offense not more than five years, and for the second or other offense for not more than ten years.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. FAULKNER. I move to amend the amendment reported by the committee by striking out in line 6, after the words "guilty of," the word "rape" and insert the words "a felony;" so as to read:

That every person who shall carnally and unlawfully know any female under the age of sixteen years, or who shall be accessory to such carnal and unlawful knowledge before the fact, shall be guilty of a felony, and when convicted thereof shall be punished by imprisonment at hard labor, for the first offense not more than five years, and for the second or other offense for not more than ten years.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FAULKNER. I desire to offer a further amendment to the amendment of the committee. I move to insert, in line 6, after the word "fact," the words "in any Territory, the District of Columbia, or other place over which the United States has exclusive jurisdiction, or on any vessel within the admiralty or maritime jurisdiction of the United States and out of the jurisdiction of any State."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. EVARTS. Ought not the title to be changed in consequence of the amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The title has not yet been reached.

Mr. HAWLEY. It occurs to me that a person guilty of the offense described here may also be a person under sixteen years of age, and that you are making what in the common law is simply fornication, a penitentiary offense, and making it punishable very severely as rape. If the bill provided for punishing an adult, a person over twenty-one years of age, guilty of unlawful connection with a girl under sixteen, I should not make any particular objection; but it seems to me that it is a little bit harsh and liable to be abused as it now stands. I submit the point to the consideration of the Senator who has charge of the bill.

Mr. FAULKNER. I will state that the age was fixed by the committee after considerable discussion and an examination of the laws of the several States. Some of the States have changed their laws. A number of the States have fixed the age of sixteen. Some of them have fixed as high as eighteen. Mississippi, Colorado, and Alabama have fixed as high as eighteen.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senator perhaps did not comprehend my suggestion. I was making no objection to the age of sixteen; but it will occur to any Senator that this applies to a boy under sixteen, and that he is punished for rape by a heavy sentence, and the girl, who may be the blameworthy person, escapes. I was suggesting that if the bill said that an adult or a man of twenty-one years and over, if guilty of this offense, should be punished in this way described, I should have less to say. I made the suggestion that possibly it was harsh to punish one person with five years in the penitentiary, while the other person participating in the crime, equally guilty, or more guilty it may be, in many cases escapes.

Mr. FAULKNER. The Senator will find that the minimum punishment is not fixed in the bill, so that cases brought before the court can be dealt with according to the facts. If the party is not morally guilty, though technically so, it is in the power of the court to make the punishment exceedingly lenient, or there may be a mere nominal punishment imposed.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I think the title should be made to correspond with the bill as it now stands.

On motion of Mr. FAULKNER, the title was amended so as to read: "A bill to amend the Revised Statutes relating to the District of Columbia, for the protection of girls under sixteen years of age in any Territory, the District of Columbia, or other place over which the United States has exclusive jurisdiction, and for other purposes."

Mr. FAULKNER. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments to the bill and ask for a conference with the House of Representatives thereon.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. FAULKNER, Mr. SPOONER, and Mr. FARWELL were appointed.

OFFICE-HOLDING BY MEMBERS OF TERRITORIAL LEGISLATURES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1951) to prohibit members of Territorial Legislatures holding office.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Territories with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That no person elected a member of the Legislative Assembly of any Territory shall, during the term for which he shall have been elected, hold any civil office by appointment of the governor of such Territory or from the council or Legislative Assembly of such Territory.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PLATT. I think the title had better be changed "to prohibit members of Territorial Legislatures from holding certain offices."

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to prohibit members of Territorial Legislatures holding certain offices."

TRANSFER OF COURT ROOMS TO CITY OF UTICA.

Joint resolution (H. Res. 103) authorizing and directing the Department of Justice to transfer certain rooms which have been occupied by the United States courts and officials to the city of Utica, N. Y., was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is a direction to the Department of Justice to transfer and relinquish to the city of Utica, N. Y., all the right, title, and claim of the United States to the rooms in what is described as the City Hall, in Utica, formerly used for the United States courts and officials thereof under a deed or lease executed on the 25th of May, 1857, the same having been entirely abandoned by these courts and their officials, a new building having been erected by the Government for the convenience and occupancy of the United States courts.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ADDITIONAL LOT FOR SENATE STABLES.

The bill (S. 2539) to authorize and direct the purchase of part of a lot adjoining the Senate stables for their ventilation, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The Secretary of the Interior is to purchase, for the use of the United States, that part of lot 11, in square 683, in the city of Washington, District of Columbia, as laid out and recorded in the original plat of the city and District, lying directly north of the Senate stables, and containing 6,087 square feet, at a sum not to exceed $6,087, upon proof of a perfect title and the execution to the United States of a deed good and sufficient in law and in form approved by the Attorney-General.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THOMAS J. MILLER.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore Order of Business 1442, being the bill (S. 33) for the relief of Thomas J. Miller, will be passed over, as it is adversely reported.

BRIGHTWOOD RAILWAY COMPANY.

The bill (S. 2742) to incorporate the Brightwood Railway Company of the District of Columbia was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, line 21, after the word "Columbia," to strike out "either or;" and in the same line, after the word "companies," to strike out "may" and insert "shall;" and after the word "tracks," in line 21, to strike out:

When, on account of the width of the streets, or for other sufficient reason, it shall be deemed by the commissioners of the District of Columbia to be necessary; and in such case they may use such tracks in common.

So as to read:

Whenever the foregoing route or routes may coincide with the duly authorized route or routes of any other duly incorporated street-railway company in the District of Columbia, both companies shall use the same tracks, upon such fair and equitable terms as may be agreed upon by said companies; and in the event said companies fail to agree upon equitable terms, either of said companies may apply, by petition, to the supreme court of the District of Columbia, which shall hear and determine the matter in due form of law, and adjudge to the proper party the amount of compensation to be paid therefor.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, line 23, after the word "assessments," to strike out "of personal taxes," and in line 24, before the word "property," to insert "personal;" so as to read:

And said per cent. of its gross earnings shall be in lieu of all other assessments upon its personal property, used solely and exclusively in the operation and management of said railway.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, line 1, after the word "laid," to strike out "in the center of the avenue as near as may be, to," and insert "upon such part of the road as may be designated by the commissioners of the District, and must;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. That the said railway shall be laid upon such part of the road as may be designated by the commissioners of the District, and must be constructed of good materials, and in a substantial and durable manner, with the rails of the most approved pattern, all to be approved by the commissioners of the District, laid upon an even surface with the pavement of the street, and in such a manner as to interfere with the ordinary travel as little as practicable; and the gauge to correspond with that of other city railroads.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 6, line 15, after the word "corporation," to strike out "and;" so as to read:

It shall also be lawful for said corporation, its successors or assigns, to erect and maintain, to such convenient and suitable points along its lines as may seem most desirable to the board of directors of the said corporation, subject to the approval of the commissioners of the District, an engine house or houses, boiler house or houses, and all other buildings necessary for the successful operation of an electric or cable-motor railroad.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the end of section 12, to add the words "after five days' notice;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 12. That all articles of value that may be inadvertently left in any of the cars or other vehicles of the said company shall be taken to its principal depot and entered in a book of record of unclaimed goods, which book shall be open to the inspection of the public, and if said property remains unclaimed for one year the company may sell the same after five days' notice.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 14, line 2, before the word "board," to strike out "the" and insert "a;" so as to read:

SEC. 14. That the government and direction of the affairs of the company shall be vested in a board of nine directors, who shall be stockholders of record.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 15, line 2, before the word "such," to strike out "and prescribe;" and in line 5, after the word "to," to strike out "the" and insert "this;" so as to make the section read:

The amendment was agreed to.

SEC. 15. That the directors shall have the power to make such by-laws, rules, and regulations as they shall deem needful and proper touching the disposition and management of the stock, property, estate, and effects of the company and the management of its business, not contrary to this charter or to the laws of the United States and the ordinance of the District of Columbia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 16, line 2, after the word "stockholders," to strike out "for choice of" and insert "to choose;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 16. That there shall be an annual meeting of the stockholders to choose directors, to be holden at such time and place, under such conditions and upon such notice as the said company in their by-laws may prescribe; and said directors shall annually make a report in writing of their doings to the stockholders.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 19, line 2, after the word "act," to strike out "at any time;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 19. That Congress reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FREEDMAN'S SAVINGS AND TRUST COMPANY.

The bill (S. 1138) to reimburse the depositors of the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company for losses incurred by the failure of said company was announced as next in order.

Mr. VANCE. I object to the consideration of that bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MANDERSON in the chair). The bill will be passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

WILLIAM M'GARRAHAN.

The bill (S. 1030) to submit to the Court of Claims for adjudication the title of William McGarrahan to the mineral interest of the rancho "Panoche Grande," in the State of Colorado, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. TELLER. I desire that that shall keep its place on the Calendar, so that when we next go to the Calendar it shall be called.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

AGREEMENT WITH SHOSHONES, BANNOCKS, AND SHEEPEATERS.

The bill (S. 2992) to accept and ratify the agreement submitted by the Shoshones, Bannocks, and Sheepeaters of the Fort Hall and Lemhi reservations, in Idaho, May 14, 1880, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. An amendment to this bill has been proposed by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN]. He is not here to present it.

Mr. DAWES. The bill was reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs without amendment, according to the Calendar. I do not remember any amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. An amendment intended to be proposed was submitted by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], who is not now in his seat, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DAWES. What is the amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There are no committee amendments to the bill. The bill is in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. DAWES. I think it would be better to let it go over without prejudice until the Senator from Alabama is in his seat. I am not quite familiar with the amendment which he proposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

JULIET C. PALMER.

Mr. CAMERON. I ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of a bill which was passed over some time since. It is Order of Business 252, Senate bill 607.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let us go on with the regular Calendar under the unanimous agreement.

Mr. CAMERON. This will only take a few minutes. It was passed over some time since.

Mr. TELLER. Let us go on with the Calendar.

Mr. COCKRELL. There was unanimous consent given to go on with the Calendar regularly until 2 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to consider the bill (S. 607) for the relief of Juliet C. Palmer, widow and administratrix of James C. Palmer, late Surgeon-General United States Navy. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. COCKRELL. Was the bill objected to when it was called up in its regular order?

Mr. CAMERON. I was not present when it was called before.

Mr. COCKRELL. I reserve the right to object to it. Can the Chair inform me whether it was objected to before?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It was objected to, but allowed to retain its place on the Calendar under Rule VIII, the Chair is informed by the Secretary.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope the Senator from Pennsylvania will not insist upon considering that bill this morning. Let us go on regularly until 2 o'clock and then the Senator can call it up at the end of the business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CAMERON. I would rather it should be passed now unless there is objection.

Mr. COCKRELL. I reserve the right to object when I shall have looked at the report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No objection being made to the consideration of the bill, it will be read.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the bill; but before concluding—

Mr. COCKRELL. I object to that bill. It involves a very intricate question about the distribution of prize money. We have had a number of bills of that kind here, and it will lead to considerable discussion. I trust its consideration will not be insisted on this morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill being objected to, will be passed over, and the next order of business will be stated.

W. J. MOBERLY.

The next business on the Calendar was the resolution reported by Mr. BATE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, May 31, 1888, referring the petition of W. J. Moberly to the Court of Claims.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Be it resolved, That the claim of W. J. Moberly, late first lieutenant Fourth United States Cavalry, for $776.95, alleged to have been erroneously withheld from his salary as lieutenant aforesaid, be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims for adjustment under the various provisions of law for such cases made and provided.

The resolution was agreed to.

TERRITORIAL MUNICIPAL BONDS.

The bill (S. 3058) relieving municipalities in the Territories in certain cases was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to authorize all village and city corporations within the Territories to issue bonds in due form for necessary improvements, such as public buildings, water-works, and general sewers, to an amount not exceeding 4 per cent. of the assessed valuation of the city or village corporation, in addition to their bonded indebtedness of January 1, 1888; but this shall not be construed to authorize any city or village corporation to lend its credit to any person or corporation to aid in the building of water-works. The net income arising from water-works thus constructed is to be set aside and held as a sinking fund to pay the bonds issued for the building of water-works in any village or city corporation; and whenever there shall be $1,000 in such sinking fund the money shall be invested in United States bonds or in purchasing the outstanding bonds of the city or village corporation issued for the building of the water-works, as the proper authorities of the village or city corporation shall determine.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

SARAH K. M'LEAN.

The bill (S. 1284) for the relief of Sarah K. McLean, widow of the late Lieut. Col. Nathaniel H. McLean, was announced as next in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. I make the same objection to that. Let it be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

TELEGRAPHIC FRANCHISES OF PACIFIC RAILROADS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 1426) supplementary to the act of July 1, 1862, entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," and also of the act of July 2, 1864, and other acts amendatory of said first named act.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Interstate Commerce with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, line 11, before the word "maintain," to strike out "construct;" so as to make the section read:

That all railroad and telegraph companies to which the United States has granted any subsidy in lands or bonds or loan of credit for the construction of either railroad or telegraph lines, which, by the acts incorporating them, or by any act amendatory or supplementary thereto, are required to construct, maintain, or operate telegraph lines, and all companies engaged in operating said railroad or telegraph lines shall forthwith and henceforward, by and through their own respective corporate officers and employés, maintain and operate, for railroad, governmental, commercial, and all other purposes, telegraph lines, and exercise by themselves alone all the telegraph franchises conferred upon them and obligations assumed by them under the acts making the grants as aforesaid.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, line 4, before the word "maintain," to strike out "construct;" so as to read:

That if any such railroad or telegraph company referred to in the first section of this act, or company operating such railroad or telegraph line, shall refuse or fail, in whole or in part, to maintain and operate a telegraph line as provided in this act and acts to which this is supplementary, for the use of the Government or the public, for commercial and other purposes.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments and ask for a conference with the House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Presiding Officer was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. CULLOM, Mr. PLATT, and Mr. GORMAN were appointed.

LOREN W. HASTINGS.

The bill (S. 2384) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Loren W. Hastings was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Committee on Military Affairs reported amendments, in line 5, after the name "Hastings," to strike out "who was" and insert "as;" and in line 6, after the word "Infantry," to strike out "and who was subsequently honorably discharged from the naval service with the thanks of the Department" and insert "and enter thereon in lieu thereof the words 'absented himself without leave on the 29th day of March, 1862, at Pittsburgh, Tenn., and enlisted on the 6th day of April, 1862, at Cairo, Ill., as a seaman on board of the United States steamer Cairo, and was on December 1, 1865, honorably discharged from the naval service, as shown by the records of the Navy Department;'" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to remove the charge of desertion standing against the record of Loren W. Hastings, as a private in Company G, Sixth Iowa Volunteer Infantry, and enter thereon in lieu thereof the words "absented himself without leave on the 29th day of March, 1862, at Pittsburgh, Tenn., and enlisted on the 6th day of April, 1862, at Cario, Ill., as a seaman on board of the United States steamer Cario, and was on December 1, 1865, honorably discharged from the naval service, as shown by the records of the Navy Department.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS REPORTED ADVERSELY.

The bill (S. 1953) to provide for the payment of the passage of General de Lafayette and family from France to the United States in 1824, as the guest of the nation, etc., was announced as next in order.

Mr. PLATT. That is reported adversely, and, although I should like to have it passed, I suppose I can not have it done now.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. The practice of the Chair has been to pass over those bills which are reported adversely, but it seems to me they ought to be considered, unless where there is a minority report, and be indefinitely postponed. Where there is a unanimous adverse report, and there is no objection to its being done, the bill ought to be disposed of and gotten off the Calendar; and for the purpose of moving that this bill be indefinitely postponed, I ask that the Senate proceed to its consideration.

Mr. PLATT. It can not be considered under the five-minute rule, I wish the Senator to understand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the unanimous consent was to consider bills favorably reported and on the Calendar and not objected to, under Rule VIII.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I did not understand it that way.

Mr. PLATT. Let me say with regard to this particular bill as illustrating the matter——

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I withdraw my suggestion.

Mr. PLATT. I think the bill ought to pass, and I should not be content to have it disposed of without a thorough statement of the circumstances of the case. I do not, however, ask to do that now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

BUREAU OF EDUCATION.

Mr. BLAIR. I this morning submitted an amendment to the sundry civil bill, the design of which is to modify the law now existing, so that the Bureau of Education may not be moved, if, on consideration by Congress, the law requiring the removal be thought to be a bad law. The Commissioner thinks it will be greatly destructive to the bureau to remove it, especially where he is required to, and as the bureau has prepared a very short statement of the injury that will be done to it by its removal to the Pension Office, which it desires to have printed in the RECORD that Senators may look into the matter, I ask that it be printed in the RECORD. It is only three pages of type-written copy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire asks that the paper presented by him be printed in the RECORD. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The paper is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, BUREAU OF EDUCATION,
Washington, D. C., July 19, 1888.

DEAR SIR: I beg leave to present to you, as chairman of the Senate Committee on Education and Labor, a summary statement of the Bureau of Education in case of its removal to the Pension building.

On March 31, 1888, the following estimates were given to the Commissioner of Pensions, showing the amount of space that would be required: For museum, 3,500 square feet; for the library, 2,500 square feet; for storing and handling documents, 2,000 square feet; for the Commissioner and the clerical force, 3,600 square feet; total, 11,60 square feet. The above estimates were based as nearly as possible upon the present requirements of the office, not allowing for any increase in clerical force, collections, or facilities.

A statement regarding the character and extent of the collections owned by the bureau wi show how moderate those estimates are.

The library of the bureau is a growth of twenty-one years, acquired by gift and by exchange and purchase from many different countries. It has been selected with care, with the design that it should be strictly pædagogical in character. The result is that the Government has acquired, at a very moderate cost, the largest and best purely educational library in the world, embracing original works, journals, magazines, and official reports in all civilized languages. The number of bound volumes exceeds 20,000, and the pamphlets 75,000, besides many duplicates to be used in exchanges.

The bureau has made an excellent beginning toward the formation of a complete pædagogical museum, which is intended to contain material illustrating every step, process, and apparatus useful in every grade of instruction. It now possesses a very extensive collection, perhaps unequaled anywhere else in the world, embracing globes, maps, telluriums, botanical, chemical, and zoological specimens; casts, photographs, drawings, engravings, etchings, models, specimens of lacquer, bronze, marble, and other artistic material; a large amount of very valuable and delicate optical and physical apparatus; a quantity of kindergarten material; and a rare and beautiful collection of Japanese needlework and school literature and apparatus, presented by the Japanese Government.

To properly protect and use these two unequaled collections, the library and the museum; to make them available to the working force of the bureau, whose tools they are, and accessible to the educational public who resort to them for study and research, the amount of space above estimated is barely sufficient. By actual measurement the shelves and cases containing the books and files of the bureau extend to 538 feet, not including the basement in which the publications are stacked. The thirty or more glass cases of the museum measure 240 feet. If, therefore, the shelves and cases of the bureau were placed end to end they would form a line that would reach more than three average squares, the greater part of it being 10 feet high.

The general argument against removal, being a full and clear statement of the kind of work done in this office, and the special kind of accommodations and facilities required, together with an exposition of the damage to property, the interruption and delay of work, the inconvenience suffered, and expense incurred in a former removal may be found in a letter of the Commissioner to the Secretary of the Interior, of April 6, 1888, of which a copy can be furnished if needed.

Very respectfully, yours,

J. W. HOLCOMBE,
Acting Commissioner.

Hon. H. W. BLAIR,
United States Senate.

Mr. BLAIR. I also ask that the amendment be printed in the RECORD. It is very brief.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so ordered, if there be no objection.

The proposed amendment is as follows:

Amend by inserting in line 5, of page 57, after the words "General Land Office," the words "and the Bureau of Education."

PUBLIC-LAND LAWS.

The bill (S. 3077) to repeal all laws providing for the pre-emption of the public lands, the laws allowing entries for timber culture, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. TELLER. That can not be considered under the five-minute rule. I do not want to object to it, but it may stand over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

JACOB D. FELTHOUSEN AND OTHERS.

The bill (S. 463) for the relief of Jacob D. Felthousen and the heirs of William H. Akins, deceased, was announced as next in order.

Mr. PLATT. That is a bill for the extension of a patent which would cover all sewing-machine patents, and I do not suppose it can be disposed of now. I ask that it may go over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

P. A. LEATHERBURY.

The bill (H. R. 3008) for the relief of P. A. Leatherbury was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It empowers the Secretary of the Treasury to pay P. A. Leatherbury, of Accomac County, Virginia, $601.27, the amount paid by him to Lucy Roberts, on pension-checks numbered 6863 and 6864, which were afterward recalled and canceled and returned to the Treasury.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE BUSINESS.

Mr. PUGH. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Before putting the motion the Chair will lay before the Senate bills from the House of Representatives.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope the Senator will withdraw the motion until the regular order is laid before the Senate. When that should have been done, I was about to make the same motion myself.

Mr. PUGH. Very well.

J. T. VINCENT.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution of the House of Representatives; which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk be directed to request the Senate to return to the House the bill (H. R. 10356) granting a pension to J. T. Vincent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The request of the House of Representatives will be complied with and the bill be returned, unless there be objection. It is so ordered.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

BUSINESS FROM THE COMMITTEE ON LABOR.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Tuesday, July 31, immediately after the reading of the Journal, be set apart for the consideration of measures reported from the Committee on Labor.

Mr. ROGERS. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ROGERS. If that order be made in these terms, will the House still operate under the 5 o'clock adjournment, or will it suspend that indefinitely during the consideration of that business?

The SPEAKER. Of course, unless that order is revoked or rescinded, it will operate on that day as on any other day.

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. OATES. If the gentleman will exclude from that order the bill to prohibit the transportation or sale of convict-made goods from one State to another I will not object; otherwise I shall.

Mr. MILLS. I hope the gentleman from Alabama will not object. We have lost the night session allotted to the committee.

Mr. OATES. Unless that bill is excluded, I shall feel it my duty to object.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Under the circumstances I shall depend upon the Committee on Rules reporting to this House a resolution setting apart that day, and I am confident the friends of labor legislation in this House will not fetter the resolution with other matters, but that we can depend on having the day named set apart for that business.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama objects.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman from Alabama will withdraw his objection.

Mr. OATES. Exclude that bill, and I will not object.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Then I would ask unanimous consent to offer the resolution for reference to the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the introduction of the resolution for reference to the Committee on Rules?

I ask unanimous consent that on next Tuesday the House take a recess at 5 o'clock until 8 o'clock p. m.; the evening session to be devoted exclusively to the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which there shall be no objection.

Mr. DINGLEY. I suggest that some day be set apart. We have time enough now.

Mr. WEAVER. Is the Public Land Strip bill included in that request?

Mr. HOLMAN. It is not.

Mr. McCREARY. I desire to amend the proposition.

The SPEAKER. It is not amendable. This is a request for unanimous consent. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN]?

Mr. ROGERS. If the evening session be limited to half past 10 o'clock, I have no objection.

Mr. MORROW moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. BURNES, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. 10896) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, and for prior years, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Speaker, I wish to reserve all points of order on the bill. Accompanying it there is a report expressing the views of the majority of the committee, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD to-morrow morning.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

There is no new legislation in the bill except the following on pages 3 and 4, which is urgently recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury for the better enforcement of the alien contract labor law, namely:

"That the act approved February 23, 1887, entitled 'An act to amend an act to prohibit the importation and immigration of foreigners and aliens under contract or agreement to perform labor in the United States, its Territories, and the District of Columbia,' be, and the same is hereby, so amended as to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury, in case he shall be satisfied that an immigrant has been allowed to land contrary to the prohibition of that law, to cause such immigrant within a reasonable time, say one year, to be taken into custody and returned to the country from whence he came, at the expense of the owner of the importing vessel, or, if he entered from an adjoining country, at the expense of the person previously contracting for the services.

"That the act approved February 26, 1885, entitled 'An act to prohibit the importation and migration of foreigners and aliens under contract or agreement to perform labor in the United States, its Territories, and the District of Columbia,' be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to an informer who furnishes original information that the law has been violated such a share of the penalties recovered as he may deem reasonable and just, not exceeding 50 per cent., where it appears that the recovery was had in consequence of the information thus furnished."

In obedience to the order of the House, expressed in the following resolution, adopted December 19, 1887, provision is made for the payment of all claims which have been reported by the Court of Claims under the act of January 20, 1885:

"Resolved, That the reports of the Court of Claims under the act of Congress entitled 'An act to provide for the ascertainment of claims of American citizens for spoliations committed by the French prior to the 31st day of July, 1801,' approved January 20, 1885, be referred to the Committee on Appropriations when appointed, with instructions to report to this House all such claims as have been decided favorably to the claimants and so reported by the Court of Claims in the general deficiency bill for the consideration of the House."

It will be for the House to determine whether the appropriations contained in the bill for the payment of these claims, or any part of them, shall now be made, the Committee on Appropriations having no discretion in the premises, except to report provision for their payment under the terms of the above resolution.

The undersigned members of the committee submit the following views touching the FRENCH SPOLIATION CLAIMS.

The resolution declares that they shall be reported for the consideration of the House, and the avowed object of its passage announced in debate was to secure a hearing for the claims at the present session of Congress. Their great magnitude, and the interesting and important questions involved in their consideration, render it proper and necessary that the committee should furnish to the House all pertinent information in their power upon the subject of these claims, and should state the questions regarding them which will arise for the decision of the House.

Under the reference act of January 20, 1885, by which these claims were referred to the Court of Claims for investigation and report, it was provided that the findings and reports of the court should be taken to be merely advisory as to the law and facts found, and should not conclude either the claimants or Congress, and that nothing in the act should be construed as committing the United States to the payment of any of the claims. The responsibility, therefore, rests upon Congress to determine these cases of claim upon their merits, accepting the reports thereon from the Court of Claims as advisory merely and not conclusive. The findings of the court in the several cases puts the House in possession of facts which are indispensable to its intelligent action, while the conclusions at which the court arrives upon points of law involved in their investigation are entitled to most respectful attention. Still, the findings of the court, whether of fact or law, are not judgments of the court in a judicial sense, and can not therefore be reviewed in the Supreme Court or take rank as authority in the consideration of the claims by Congress.

The first fact that attracts attention in coming to the consideration of these claims is their great magnitude. The law officers of the Government inform us that upon computation of them as filed in the Court of Claims they exceed the sum of $40,000,000, and the number of vessels seized or detained, as set forth in petitions filed, is 2,300. Mr. Webster, speaking for the claimants in the Senate in 1836, declared that "the papers showed that American citizens had claims against the French Government for 615 vessels unlawfully seized and confiscated," and the estimates heretofore made of the total amount of the claims have ranged from one-fourth to one-eighth only of the amount now demanded. From the best means of information at hand the committee are of opinion that after all deductions and rejections by the Court of Claims the aggregate amount will exceed $30,000,000. The amount already reported by the court and included in the present bill is therefore but a small part of the whole, but a decision by Congress to pay the reported items or any one of them will in principle commit the Government fully upon the whole question of payment.

Before the passage of the reference act of 1885 the position of the claimants was quite different from that assigned to them by the present bill. For half a century or more bills for their relief, presented from time to time, provided for an appropriation of $5,000,000, to be distributed among them pro rata in extinguishment of their demands, being about one-sixth of the probable amount of expenditure to which the Government will be committed by approving the items of appropriation contained in the present bill. Inasmuch, however, as the act of 1885 did not commit the Government to any principle of action upon the claims, the whole question of their allowance, and, if allowed, the manner of paying them, and the amount to be paid, remain open for the deliberate and intelligent judgment of Congress.

It is understood that of these claims one-half or more in amount is demanded by insurance companies, or by receivers representing them, being for insurance moneys paid in cases of loss, or upon assignments made by original claimants. It will be for Congress to determine whether any distinction shall be made between insurance companies and individual claimants with reference to the merit of their demands, respectively, and generally as to assigned claims, whether the provision of the third section of the reference act of 1885, that the court shall ascertain in the case of assigned claims the actual consideration paid therefor, shall be regarded as important, and its apparent purpose be enforced.

FRENCH SPOLIATIONS.

The claims in question originated mostly in the years 1798 and 1799, and were the subject of negotiation between the United States and France in the year 1800. Eventually a convention treaty was signed by the negotiators on the 30th day of September, 1800, which was subsequently, 3d February, 1801, amended by the United States Senate by striking out the second article and substituting therefor a provision that the treaty should continue in force for eight years.

The second article, so expunged by the Senate, was in the following language:

"SEC. 2. The ministers plenipotentiary of the two parties not being able to agree at present respecting the treaty of alliance of 6th February, 1778, the treaty of amity and commerce of the same date, and the convention of 14th November, 1788, nor upon the indemnities mutually due or claimed, the parties will negotiate further upon those subjects at a convenient time, and until they may have agreed upon those points the said treaties and convention shall have no operation."

It will be seen by this section that certain differences between the two countries regarding claims and old treaties were postponed, accompanied by the declaration that negotiation upon them should be resumed at a convenient time, and that until such negotiation and an agreement to revive them the old treaties should have no operation.

The claims now in controversy are presented mainly upon the following grounds:

First. That they were valid claims against France when the treaty of 1800 was made, and that France had acknowledged their justice and legality.

Second. That further negotiation between the United States and France for their consideration was provided for by the second article of the treaty, above recited.

Third. That by striking out that article from the treaty in the United States Senate the claims were abandoned or released to France.

Fourth. That this abandonment or release was in consideration of the abandonment or release by France of her pretensions under the old treaties of 1778 and was an equivalent therefor.

And, lastly, that the transaction was a virtual appropriation by the United States of private property to public use, entitling the claimants to just compensation therefor upon a familiar principle of justice recognized by American constitutional law.

RULE OF COMPENSATION.

Before considering the several grounds of claim above presented it will be important to understand clearly the rule of compensation which the claimants will be entitled to invoke in case their claims shall be admitted for payment by the United States. If they have a right to recover, what will be just compensation to them for the alleged appropriation of their property for public use? It is undoubtedly a principle of law that where private property is taken for public use, and the appropriation is total and permanent, the value of the property at the time of appropriation is to be paid to the owner. If, therefore, the claims against France were in the nature of property and were appropriated to public use by our Government, their pecuniary value at the time they were so used will be the standard of compensation to the claimants.

It would be an affectation of learning to cite authority in support of this rule, it being one of general acceptance and of undoubted justice. The value, if any, to the claimants of the possibility of renewed and successful negotiation on their behalf under the expunged article of the treaty of 1800 measures exactly the extent of their alleged loss by the action of our Government. For at the utmost their claims at the time of alleged appropriation were worth no more than the estimated value of their chance of recovering them under the second article of the treaty. By their own argument they were deprived only of the chance of indemnity from France by negotiation in the future, at some time convenient to both Governments, and when France should be disposed or be coerced or persuaded to pay. But that this chance or possibility of renewed negotiation, and of obtaining indemnities from France thereby, in the contemplation and belief of our envoys, and presumably also of the Senate, was wholly unreal and illusory can be clearly shown, and that this belief was well founded appears not only from an examination of the facts then known, but from the history of subsequent events.

Bonaparte refused indemnities after Marengo, and dictated a treaty which excluded them from allowance. Would he have admitted them after Austerlitz, or Jena, or Tilsit? Much less would he have found a convenient time for considering them after Moscow and Leipsic, in the days of his declining power. Alike in the days of glory and disaster, his selfishness, arrogance, and insensibility to human suffering and human needs (outside the circle of dependents and supporters) fitted him to be an inflexible, unsympathetic enemy to the American claims. Even those claimswhich were provided for by the treaty of 1800 in the fourth and fifth articles remained unpaid, the subject of urgent demand by us, until the convention treaty of 30th April, 1803, accompanying the Louisiana purchase, was made.

In fact, the American minister, Mr. Livingston, congratulated himself upon his success in touching the pride of Bonaparte by a direct communication to him on the subject of those acknowledged claims and obtaining from him a promise of speedy payment. The French treasury, however, was not in a condition to pay nearly $4,000,000, the estimated amount of those claims, and this circumstance probably facilitated the sale to us of the Territory of Louisiana, out of the purchase-money for which those claims were ultimately paid.

But the official correspondence preceding the Louisiana purchase shows how idle and useless would have been any attempt at renewed negotiation with Bonaparte for payment of war claims antedating the treaty of 1800, even if that treaty had left them open for consideration. Still more decisive is the fact, that under Bonaparte as emperor fresh and severe depredations were committed upon our commerce, for which no redress could be obtained for more than twenty years. By his Berlin and Milan decrees, and by other measures of his government, he struck at our rights as a neutral power, broke his treaty obligations with us, and let loose upon our merchant ships the spoilers of the sea. During his great struggle with England his attitude towards us was wholly selfish and unjust, preceding all possibility of successful negotiation with him for redress of wrongs.

MR. CLAY'S REPORT.

In Mr. Clay's report as Secretary of State, to the United States Senate, dated 20th of May, 1826, he set forth the grounds on which the claimants presented their demands, now in controversy, against our Government, and submitted to the Senate the question, "Whether equitable considerations do not require some compensation to be made to the claimants?" He added, however:

"The Senate is also best able to estimate the probability which existed of an ultimate recovery from France of the amount due for those indemnities if they had not been renounced [abandoned]; in making which estimate it will give just weight to the painful consideration that repeated and urgent appeals have been in vain made to the justice of France for satisfaction of flagrant wrongs committed upon property of other citizens of the United States subsequent to the period of 30th September, 1800."

These observations by Mr. Clay are extremely important, in two points of view:

1. They show that upon the grounds of claim set forth by the claimants, assuming their full force and validity, Mr. Clay was of opinion that the claimants should not be paid by our Government the full amount of their claims. It was for the Senate to decide whether, upon the alleged facts, "some compensation" should not be made. It was doubtless in accordance with this view that the claimants, their counsel in Washington, and their supporters in Congress, at various times, and persistently, proposed an appropriation of $5,000,000 as the compensation which the claimants would accept, and which it would be reasonable or proper for the Government to pay, in full extinguishment of their claims. A great many reports have been made and bills introduced into Congress and urged upon public attention, fixing that sum of $5,000,000 as the whole amount to be paid. The "some compensation" has now, however, risen from the $5,000,000 of former times to $30,000,000, under the impetus given to the claims by the reference act of 1885. But as that act provided only for an investigation of the claims and reports thereon, expressly reserving to Congress full freedom of action and judgment after reports were made, it follows that the $5,000,000 limitation has not been waived by Congress nor, in fact, been formally withdrawn by the claimants.

2. But by the report of 1826 the Senate were also invited to consider the probability of a recovery of the claims from France if they had been left open and expressly subject to after negotiation by the treaty of 1800; and upon that point the Secretary referred the Senate to the continued failure of our Government to secure satisfaction from France for flagrant wrongs committed upon our commerce by her subsequent to the date of that treaty.

The Secretary's reference was undoubtedly to the claims above referred to, for depredations under the imperial decrees and authority of Bonaparte subsequent to 1800, which were in open violation of existing treaties and neutral rights, and which had been made the subject of unavailing remonstrance and negotiation by our Government under three Presidents—Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe—and were then being continued under the younger Adams. All attempts to obtain redress had failed, and continued efforts then being made did not promise success. Mr. Clay had therefore good reason to submit to the Senate the pertinent and significant question, Is it probable that France would have agreed to pay the old contested claims prior in date to 1800, if negotiations upon them at a convenient time had been reserved by the treaty of that year in its final form? If she will not pay or agree to pay more recent claims of undoubted validity—of uncontested merit—would she have ever found a convenient time to pay, or even promise to pay, the old ones? There could be but one answer to these questions, namely, an emphatic negative.

It only remains to mention upon this point that settlement and ultimate payment of the claims subsequent to 1800 were only secured by the great energy and determination of President Jackson, devoted to that object during nearly the whole eight years of his administration, and then only to the extent of 58 per cent. In his annual message of 1835 he gave an exhaustive and instructive narrative of the steps taken and difficulties encountered by him in enforcing those virtually uncontested demands upon France; and no reasonable man can rise from reading that message without a strong conviction that any attempt by us at any time to coax or coerce France to acknowledge or pay the older and disputed claims would have entirely failed, and that the original second article of the treaty of 1800 for a convenient time of negotiation thereon was utterly worthless. (See Benton's Thirty Years' View, pages 569, 588, 602.)

OPINION OF ENVOYS.

In this connection the opinion of our envoys who were concerned in the negotiation of the treaty is entitled to high consideration. In their private journal, under date of July 7, 1800, they declared:

"It was also clearly perceived that unless indemnities were secured by some means in the present negotiation they would be forever lost."

Again, pending proceedings upon the ratification of the treaty, after its amendment, William Vans Murray, our minister at The Hague (who had been one of our envoys in the negotiation of the treaty), fully and strongly expressed his deliberate judgment that the claims were without pecuniary value under the second article of the treaty. In a letter to the Secretary of State, dated at Paris, July 2, 1801, speaking of the claim for indemnities against France, he said, "I do not consider it as worth a quarter per cent.;" and in a subsequent letter to the Secretary of State, dated August 3, 1801 (after exchange of ratifications of the treaty), he said, "If the Senate meant, as I hope, to consider indemnities as worth nothing, then the business, I presume, is closed."

And again, in the same letter, he declared that in accepting the French ratification he had taken into account "the absolute want of value in the prospect of indemnities" under the second article of the treaty. This is strong evidence from a most competent witness upon the question of the value of the claims, and it also tends to prove that the second article of the treaty was originally obtained by our envoys for diplomatic and personal reasons, rather than with any expectation that it was or would be of value to American claimants.

THE NEGOTIATION AT PARIS.

The treaty of 1800, amended and ratified by the United States Senate February 3, 1801, does not, in its final form, contain any provision upon the subject of these claims. It passed them by unprovided for, although they were an object of negotiation before that treaty was made, and were referred to in the second article of the treaty when signed. Undoubtedly the claims were dropped or abandoned by our Government as a subject of negotiation with France; but under what circumstances, with what objects in view? Those who defend the action of our Government declare that the claims were abandoned simply because they could not be enforced upon France at the date of the treaty, nor was there any reasonable prospect that any future negotiation in their behalf would be successful. If this be true there is an end to controversy, for it is undeniable that our Government had performed its whole duty to the claimants up to the date of the treaty.

It had acted with great energy and had incurred heavy expense for their protection in the preceding years, and its instruction to its envoys was urgent and imperative to insist upon the claims and to agree to no treaty with France which should not provide for them; and our envoys had been for many months diligently engaged in an unsuccessful attempt to secure a recognition of the claims from France. If, therefore, it was impossible to secure their allowance by treaty, and it was evident that future negotiation in their behalf would be equally fruitless, it was just to conclude the treaty upon the basis upon which it was made—in the final form given to it by the American Senate.

But here comes into view a decisive explanation of the second article of the treaty of 1800, in both its original and its amended form, which disposes of the main argument made in former reports and still urged in behalf of these claims.

When the treaty was under consideration in our Senate, in secret session, as already mentioned the second article was expunged, and in its stead a provision inserted that the treaty should continue in force for eight years. Conjecture has been busy over this action of the Senate (in which France concurred), but as will presently appear, a perfectly natural and reasonable explanation of the fact challenges attention and acceptance. The Senate had before them the correspondence of the negotiators on both sides and the journal of proceedings and consultations of our envoys, and acted with intelligence in their amendment of the treaty, and certainly with no intention of assuming for their own country the payment of these claims. If such consequence had been presented to them as a possible effect of their amendment, it is quite certain the amendment would not have been made. But such consequence being neither a legal, natural, proper, or conceivable consequence of their amendment, that amendment was evidently made for the reasons which we shall now proceed to mention.

In the first place, the Senate, unlike our envoys, were not bound by instructions; they could give to the treaty such form as they judged advisable with due reference to existing conditions in our relations with France, and with a wise forecast of the future; they were well informed that the second article was not asked for by France, but was a diplomatic device to relieve our envoys from an apparent breach of instructions and usurpation of authority in signing the treaty, and the Senate must have been convinced of the utter uselessness of the article, and of its liability to create with claimants unfounded or delusive hopes of future negotiation in the interest of their claims. While it was no doubt firmly believed that the article could do no good—could secure no advantage to our Government or to the claimants in future—it might do harm, because it was misleading.

That the reservation of future negotiation in the second article of the treaty, in its original form, was a diplomatic device of the negotiators, as already stated, and was not intended by them to be a substantial or practically operative provision in future, sufficiently appears from their official correspondence to be presently cited; and that the provision was worthless to the claimants, and therefore properly rejected by the Senate, will also appear from an examination of the provision itself and from the history of succeeding times.

The ultimatum of Bonaparte, presented to our envoys after protracted correspondence and conferences, consisted of two alternative propositions, either one of which might be accepted as the basis of a new treaty, but the acceptance of either one necessarily involved the rejection of the other. Both could not stand. All that was left to our envoys was a choice between them. That ultimatum (maintained by France with slight modifications of detail in the subsequent course of the negotiation) was clearly stated by the French negotiators to our envoys in a letter dated 11th August, 1800. (Report of 1826, page 616.) In that communication they proceeded to state their first proposition, which was—

"To stipulate a full and entire recognition of the treaties and the reciprocal engagement of compensation for damages resulting on both sides from their infraction; but if the American envoys should continue to think it is impossible for them to acknowledge the treaties with the advantage of their date * * * the French Government would consent to the abolition of the treaties."

And therefore their second proposition was—

"The abolition of ancient treaties, the formation of a new treaty in which the French nation, laying aside a privilege disagreeable to the United States, would treat for its political and commercial relations as the most favored nation, and in which there would be no demand of compensation."

And they concluded by restating these alternatives in condensed form:

"Either the ancient treaties with the privileges resulting from priority, and the stipulations of reciprocal indemnities; or a new treaty assuming equality without indemnity."

Our envoys were greatly embarrassed by this communication, the outcome of all their efforts to obtain terms from France and to secure the objects of their mission. The acceptance of the first alternative was plainly impossible for several most commanding reasons; nor is there any ground to believe that the French negotiators expected its acceptance. It was in flat contempt of our act of Congress which had abrogated those treaties, which act Congress alone could repeal. It was wholly inconsistent with the existing Jay treaty with Great Britain, and would embroil us with that country, and by its revival of exclusive privileges to French cruisers in our ports would have destroyed our declared position as a neutral power. There were other objections, but these alone were decisive. Besides, it was not within their power, under their instructions, to revive or renew the old treaties; nor, if they had possessed greater powers, could they have overcome the insuperable obstacles which stood in the way of a renewal treaty and its ratification.

All this was well known to the French negotiators, and their renewed proposition, coupled with claims adjusted on both sides, was doubtless diplomatic, to make their offer consistent with their prior attitude in the negotiation, and to recommend, by way of contrast, the second proposition of the alternative to the American envoys. It is now known that this ultimatum was the result of very careful consideration between the French negotiators and their own Government, and it was adroitly drawn to its intended purpose. The First Consul, then fresh from the field of Marengo, made up his mind with his accustomed decision upon the American dispute. He would agree to an unconditional peace, by-gones to be by-gones, and that amity and free commerce should obtain between his country and ours for the future. His negotiators enveloped his determination in many words, but it was plainly enough expressed in the second alternative proposition above cited.

Our negotiators gave to this proposal most earnest and anxious consideration. They were surrounded by difficulties. No desirable course lay open before them. But they were patriotic men, and they determined to do their duty, to do the best they could under the circumstances, and take the responsibility of a treaty upon the terms last proposed. Thereby they would open the ports of France to our merchants and shippers, would stop captures of our vessels upon the ocean, and would save to our merchants no less than forty ships and their valuable cargoes already seized by French cruisers but not finally condemned. These were great advantages to our commerce and to the men engaged in carrying it on, while at the same time our Government was secured from burdensome outlays under acts of Congress passed for the protection of our citizens against France. But all this could not be secured under the French offer now in question without an abandonment of the American claims; in other words, without ceasing to urge them in the negotiation. Was peace, open ports, restitution of forty ships and cargoes, and national interests all to be sacrificed to further an utterly fruitless negotiation in favor of the claims?

Their decision is shown by their journal under date of 13th September, 1800 (Report of 1826, p. 684), where they say that they were then "convinced that the door was properly closed against all hopes of obtaining indemnities with any modification of the old treaties, and it only remained to be determined whether under all the circumstances it would not be expedient to attempt a temporary arrangement which would extricate the United States from this war, or that peculiar state of hostility in which they are at present involved, save the immense property of our citizens now depending before the council of prizes, and secure as far as possible our commerce against the abuses of capture during the war."

They therefore resolved to submit to the French negotiators certain propositions as the basis of an agreement, one of which was the postponement of the subject of old treaties and indemnities in very nearly the form which it assumed afterwards in the second article of the new treaty. It is not material to trace the negotiation further to its conclusion in the signing of the new treaty on the 30th of September, nor to infer from their official correspondence the motives operating upon the negotiators in adopting the second article of that treaty.

It is plain enough, upon a consideration of all the facts recorded, that for good and sufficient reasons the American envoys accepted the second proposition of the Bonaparte ultimatum, which involved the abandonment of indemnity claims in controversy, and that the formal postponement of them along with the old treaty pretensions was with no expectation that negotiation thereon would ever be resumed; and it is evident also that the French negotiators agreed to this formal provision at the urgent request of the American envoys, and not because they attached any importance to it as a provision for the future.

Distinct and reliable evidence upon this subject is furnished by the letter of M. Fleurieu, one of the French negotiators, to M. Talleyrand, dated 11th June, 1802, and appended to this report. It was because the American envoys were bound by instructions against a formal abandonment of the American claims, and because they apprehended "the clamors of the ship-owners and merchants of the United States" that no formal renunciation of indemnity was inserted in the treaty, and the second article for an indefinite postponement of the subject inserted; but both sides to the negotiation perfectly well understood that they were agreeing upon the Bonaparte ultimatum of the 11th of August, which had conclusively defined the position of France, and which the American envoys had been compelled to accept.

For the reasons above shown the American envoys were fully justified in accepting a new treaty, with a virtual abandonment of the controverted American claims. The treaty they made was largely advantageous to our merchants and shipping interests, and it secured the ultimate payment of all the claims which could be recovered at that time from the Government of France. Nor are they to be condemned for inserting in the treaty a claims-postponement provision under the circumstances in which they were placed. Their draught of the treaty was subject to the approval, modification, or rejection of their own Government, and it was perfectly competent for the President and Senate, by rejecting or amending the treaty, to reopen negotiation with France in order to obtain more favorable terms.

In this point of view the second article might be expedient, by furnishing occasion for further correspondence. It was their intention to leave their Government as free as possible with reference to the course it would adopt, no matter what were their own fixed opinions as to the inutility of continued or renewed negotiation upon the subjects embraced by the treaty. Perhaps this consideration, in addition to those mentioned by M. Fleurieu, influenced them in obtaining the second article of the treaty. But the whole subject of the treaty was remitted to their own Government for its deliberate judgment, and they transmitted to the home authorities all the correspondence with the French negotiators and the private journal of their own consultations and proceedings for the information of the President and Senate.

AMENDMENT OF THE TREATY.

The Senate had no motive to strike out the second article of the treaty in order to get rid of the old treaties of 1778, for by that article those treaties were to have no operation in future unless readopted. We were completely free from them by the article itself, unless and until we chose to renew negotiations and voluntarily accept them. It is therefore preposterous to say that the Senate struck out the article in order to get rid of the treaties.

It is true that if both parties chose to find a convenient time to renew negotiation France might renew her "pretension" that the old treaties constituted a topic for consideration, but such pretension would not impose those treaties upon us, or give to them in any manner the force of existing obligations. We would be at perfect liberty to reject them. Besides, as will be hereafter shown, those old treaties had been abrogated for legal and just cause by the United States, and they had also been set aside by public maritime war.

Nor did the Senate strike out the article to avoid any prospective demand by France for renewed negotiation respecting them; in other words, to avoid any renewal of these pretensions by which France had sought to complicate and baffle the negotiation just closed, France had proposed in the ultimatum of 11th August to abandon all her pretensions regarding those treaties, and make a treaty of amity and commerce, regardless of them; and the second article of the new treaty, which formally reserved a chance for future negotiation, was not proposed by her, but by the American envoys. The treaty without the second article was conformed to her ultimatum, and she asked for no reservation to preserve her old treaty pretensions. The American envoys had sought and secured the second article because it saved to them the point of honor under their instructions, while their own Government was left free to accept or reject, in whole or in part, the bargain proposed. France conceded the article, not because she desired it, but because it was harmless; because it bound her to nothing in the future, not even to negotiate except when she chose, and then according to her own sovereign pleasure. It was therefore morally certain that she would never importune us to reopen negotiation under the second article, and the Senate did not strike out that article to avoid future annoyance from her upon old treaty pretensions.

Nor did the Senate strike out the second article in order to release France from the American claims, to discharge her from a legal obligation to pay them. There was no legal obligation to discharge, because the claims were war claims, which, like counter claims of France for losses on her side during hostilities, had no legal standing in any forum of debate.

It has sometimes been said that the claims, if not strictly legal, were equitable, but we are not to be misled by words. We are not here considering a question of moral obligation or of abstract justice as against France, but an obligation upon her under the sanction of international law.

But as a question under international law there was truth and force in the position of the French negotiators, declared by them in conference 12th September, 1800, that—

"If the question could be determined by an indifferent nation they were satisfied such tribunal would say that the state of things then existing was war on the side of America (they might have added on the side of France also), and that no indemnities could be claimed."

The same view as to existing war was, about the same time, announced by our Supreme Court, and was repeated by that court in cases subsequently decided, as is fully shown at another place in this present report.

The Senate, therefore, in striking out the second article of the treaty did not intend to release, and did not in fact release, France from any legal obligation to pay their claims, because no such obligation then existed.

Nor did the Senate strike out the second article with any intent of imposing the payment of the claims upon our own Government. There is no evidence that they had such a purpose, nor has it ever been imputed to them in argument. They were intelligent and able men, well informed upon the whole French controversy and upon all the details of treaty negotiation, and were fully competent to decide upon the utility of the second article, and to forsee the consequence of expunging it. That they did expunge it is strong evidence that it was worthless to the claimants (whose interests had been the main object of the negotiation), and that its elimination was not an assumption of claims payment by the United States. For if the Senate had considered the article to be of actual value to the claimants they would most certainly have retained it, inasmuch as there is good reason to believe they were friendly to the claimants and had been in full accord with the executive administration in all the prior measures adopted for their protection and relief; and whether they considered the article to be valuable or worthless, they would not, as reasonable and patriotic men, have struck it out, and thereby consciously have imposed upon our own Government a mass of claims for which it was not justly responsible, and which it was unable to pay.

If, then, the purpose of the Senate in striking out the second article was not to get rid of the old and defunct treaties, nor to avoid French demand for renewed negotiation, nor to release her from legal obligations under international law, nor to impose claims payment upon the United States, there remains but one reasonable explanation of their action, namely, the one already given in the present report. They struck out the article because it was both worthless and misleading, and therefore unfit for continuance in the text of the treaty.

Assuming that they were right in this view (and strong proof that they were so has been produced) the argument is closed; for subsequent proceedings upon the exchange of ratifications did not affect the treaty. The treaty has always remained precisely in the form in which the Senate ratified it, with the second article expunged, and in that form it is still found among the public records of our treaties and laws. In that form it was promulgated to the people of the United States by proclamation of the President, and in that form only did it ever take effect or become an instrument for legal interpretation or construction.

But a pretext for argument has been found in the form of treaty ratification adopted by Bonaparte as First Consul of the French Republic, or rather in a remark appended by him to his unqualified ratification of the instrument. An error of translation has represented that remark as a proviso to the ratification, whereas the original French indicates no condition or qualification of ratification, but only a declaration of opinion or understanding by Bonaparte, correctly described by Mr. Jefferson as simply an inference, and which, whether well or ill founded, could not affect the construction of the treaty or qualify its acceptance. This was the view taken by the Senate when the treaty was again before them; for they advised the President that it was sufficiently ratified, and of course required no further consideration. Bonaparte's added remark was treated as surplusage, requiring no attention from our Government. Claims negotiation abandonment is not denied, but Bonaparte's remark makes it no more certain than before.

FRANCE DID NOT ACKNOWLEDGE THE CLAIMS.

Much has been said in argument about an alleged recognition of the claims by the French negotiators and an acceptance by them of the principle of negotiation for their allowance; and sometimes it has been boldly asserted that the French negotiators acknowledged the justice of the claims and admitted the liability of France to pay them. This was one of the grounds upon which the Webster argument of 1836 proceeded, and was essential to its support. On the other hand, it has been asserted that there was no such recognition of the claims by the French negotiators, nor admission of their justice and of French liability for their payment. This was substantially the position taken by Silas Wright in the debate of 1835, and by General Dix ten years afterwards. Upon this question the facts are plainly set forth by the American envoys in their final report to the Secretary of State, dated 4th October, 1800, in which report they trace the course and results of the negotiations. They say:

"The claim for indemnities brought forward by them [us] was early in the negotiation connected by the French ministers with that of a restoration of treaties for the infraction of which the indemnities were principally claimed. To obviate this embarrassment, which it had not been difficult to foresee, the American ministers urged in the spirit of their instructions that the treaties having been violated by one party and renounced by the other, a priority had attached in favor of the treaty with Great Britain, etc."

After stating the considerations which led them subsequently to offer a re-adoption with limitations of the seventeenth article of the commercial treaty of 1778, relating to mutual port privileges for prizes of war, which they say the French ministers "had particularly insisted on" as essential to the honor of France, and which "they had given reason to expect would be deemed satisfactory," they add:

"The overture, however, finally produced no other effect than to enlarge the demand of the French ministers from a partial to a total renewal of the treaties, which brought the negotiation a second time to a stand."

They then proceed to state that after a deliberation of some days they made another proposition, "going the whole length of what had been insisted on," namely:

"An unlimited recognition of the former treaties, but with a right to extinguish such privileges under them as were detrimental to the United States by a pecuniary equivalent, to be made out of the indemnities which should be awarded to American citizens; a compensation which, though it might have canceled but a small portion of the indemnities, was nevertheless a liberal one for privileges which the French ministers had often admitted to be of little use to France under the construction which the American Government had given to the treaties."

They add:

"This offer, though it covered the avowed objects of the French Government, secured an engagement to pay indemnities, as well as the power to extinguish the obnoxious parts of the treaties. To avoid any engagement of this kind the French ministers now made an entire departure from the principles upon which the negotiation had proceeded for some time, and resumed the simple, unqualified ground of their overture of the 23d of Thermidor, declaring that it was indispensable to the granting of indemnities not only that the treaties should have an unqualified recognition, but that their future operation should not be varied in any particular for any consideration or compensation whatever. In short, they thought proper to add, what was quite unnecessary, that their real object was to avoid indemnities, and that it was not in the power of France to pay them. No time was requisite for the American ministers to intimate that it had become useless to pursue the negotiation further."

We have also seen by an extract from the journal of the American envoys (given elsewhere) that the French negotiators declared that the claims were barred by actual war between the two nations, and that the fact that a state of war had existed would be held by any independent power to which the question might be submitted—a view supported by our own Supreme Court in decisions subsequently rendered.

From the foregoing facts recited by the American envoys the conclusion is evident that the French negotiators did not admit the validity of the American claims against France now in controversy, or ever propose or intend to pay them. Their diplomatic dexterity in the negotiation embarrassed the American envoys; they were not entirely consistent in position throughout the correspondence, nor apparently frank and sincere in its earlier stages in announcing their determination and purpose. But it can not be fairly said that they at any time admitted liability or intended payment; on the contrary, they denied such liability or intention in express terms before the close of the negotiation.

The Webster argument of 1836 upon this point infers an acknowledgment of the claims as just and legal obligations against France from the earlier notes which passed between the negotiators, and particularly those of 7th and 9th April, 1800, which the argument recites at length. But the inference is unwarranted as applied to the present claims, and if it could be so applied would nevertheless be repelled by the subsequent correspondence.

In their letter of 7th April the American envoys proposed—

"An arrangement, such as shall be compatible with national honor and existing circumstances, to ascertain and discharge the equitable claims of the citizens of either nation upon the other, whether founded on contract, treaty, or the law of nations."

This was a carefully-drawn paper, the full significance of which will appear only when particular attention is paid to the language employed, and when proper classification of the American claims referred to is fairly understood. The proposition related to private claims on either side (excluding public or national ones), and defined those claims as equitable which would include claims of imperfect legal obligation. But the most important point is the classification of the claims, namely, those arising upon contract, those arising upon treaties, and those arising upon international law. This threefold division of the American citizen claims was not merely theoretical, a refinement of scientific analysis, but was a practical one, and was necessary to their orderly and intelligent examination.

Now, the contract claims of our citizens against France had not been denied, but had been vexatiously delayed, and it was an object of the negotiation to secure their adjustment as to amount and also provision for their payment. The second class of claims covered French appropriations of American property by seizures and embargoes prior to July 7, 1798, in violation of the treaties of 1778 (and particularly the commercial treaty of that year). As to most of those seizures and detentions, it may be said that they were in the nature of forced loans under the French decrees which authorized them, and contemplated future indemnities or payments therefor. In some cases indemnities had been voluntarily made, but the great mass of those claims remained open and unadjusted at the time of the negotiation. But that part of these so-called treaty claims which arose upon seizures between the French decree of January 18, 1798, and July 7 following, which were in the nature of reprisals upon American commerce, or so claimed to be, stood upon a different footing from most of the prior ones of the second class in the particular that France had not admitted liability or promised indemnity therefor.

With this distinction kept in view we may conveniently follow the example of the American envoys and speak of this second class as treaty claims. The third class comprised the claims for seizures between the 7th July, 1798 (when the treaties were abrogated by act of Congress), and the time of the negotiation in the year 1800. The American envoys justly held that during that period of time the treaties had no existence, and that the relations of the two countries, whatever they were, were subject to the law of nations, or, in modern language, to international law. This period of time includes the great bulk of the claims now in controversy, and as it has been shown to have been a time of public war the claims which fall within it may be correctly described as war claims.

Whether the period of hostilities, at least on the part of France, shall be carried back of the 7th July, 1798, to the date of the French decree of January 18, 1798, or even an earlier date, is a question for separate examination; at present we are concerned only with the classification of claims as made by the American envoys with reference to the abrogation of treaties by act of Congress.

It may be added that the classification is further shown by their project of a new treaty, proposed to the French negotiators April 18, 1800, by the second article of which five commissioners were to be appointed to adjust claims of citizens of the United States and of the French Republic for losses or damage sustained, and who should "decide the claims in question according to the original merits of the several cases and to justice and equity and the law of nations; and in all cases of complaint existing prior to the 7th of July, 1798, according to the treaties and consular convention then existing between France and the United States."

Having now examined the first note of the American envoys to the French negotiators, the reply thereto is next to be considered. In that reply the French negotiators said that an object of the negotiation "ought to be the determination of the regulations and the steps to be followed for the estimation and indemnification of injuries for which either nation may make claim for itself or for any of its citizens;" and another object was "to assure the execution of treaties of friendship and commerce made between the two nations, and the accomplishment of the views of reciprocal advantages which suggested them."

Now, it can not be fairly inferred from this communication that all classes of claims of American citizens against France, or of French citizens against the United States, which should be presented for consideration should be allowed and paid. They conceded that one object of the negotiation ought to be to fix the regulations and steps for estimating and satisfying both public and private claims on either side, but this did not reasonably imply that all claims were to be accepted and paid. It can only be claimed that by this note they virtually acknowledged that there were just American claims to be estimated and allowed, without defining what they were or excluding objection to particular classes of claims. It is to be remembered in this connection that a large mass of the American claims falling within the first and second classes above mentioned were not disputed in principle, were in fact admitted by the treaty of 1800, and were subsequently ascertained and paid.

But this note of the French negotiators proposed to extend the negotiation to public claims, and made the recognition of the old treaties a principle on which the negotiation should proceed; and in a subsequent note (May 6) they declared that their mission pointed out to them the treaties "as the only foundation of their negotiation." Again, on May 23 they informed the American envoys that "the tenor of their instructions made the acknowledgment of former treaties the basis of negotiation and the condition of compensation."

It has been already shown in the present paper that it was not possible for the American envoys to accept the old treaties as still in force, against the known facts of their violation by France and abrogation by us, and in view of the intervening treaty with Great Britain of 1795, and of actual hostilities between the two countries by virtue of French decrees and acts of Congress, and that such acceptance, if otherwise possible, would be in disregard of their instructions and opposed to the interests of their country.

When, therefore, the recognition of the old treaties as uninterrupted and subsisting obligations was presented by the French negotiators as the condition-precedent to entering upon the subject of indemnities, the American envoys were greatly embarrassed, as their report shows, and thenceforward they struggled unavailingly to extricate themselves from the difficulties of the situation. Finally they were compelled to accept substantially the alternative ultimatum of Bonaparte of 23d Thermidor (11th August) as the basis of a new treaty, in which, however, undisputed American claims of the first and second classes were recognized, and a formal provision for renewing negotiations about treaties and claims, "at a convenient time," was inserted.

That the French negotiators and their government were insincere in claiming that the old treaties be considered unbroken and of continued force, and their recognition in that view the condition of entering upon the consideration of private and public claims, can not be doubted by any one who has fairly examined the official documents and penetrated the motives of those who made them. It was to embarrass and baffle the American envoys that the pretense of their continued existence and importance to France was presented, and their full recognition demanded as a preliminary to claims negotiation. Well knowing that the American envoys could not accept them in the sense proposed as the basis of negotiation, they were made the sine qua non to any effective conference or agreement.

Their motive, however, was fully disclosed in the ultimatum note of 11th of August and by their open avowal to the American envoys on the 12th of September, noted by the latter upon their journal and referred to in their final report to the Secretary of State. The marks of their insincerity are also to be seen in the treatment of propositions from the American envoys for money or supply equivalents for former privileges under the treaties of 1778—extreme concessions invited or entertained by them, and afterwards rejected. Upon the whole, it is plain that they never acknowledged our citizen claims, now in question, nor ever intended to pay them, nor ever agreed to open a negotiation which might include them, except upon a condition which they knew could not be accepted by the envoys of the United States. The contract and treaty claims of our citizens theretofore acknowledged by France were not controverted in principle, but claims subsequent to the Jay treaty, and especially after the retaliatory French decree of January, 1798, they neither acknowledged nor intended to acknowledge or pay.

If there could remain difficulty, doubt, or question upon this point, after an examination of the official documents heretofore published, it would disappear upon a perusal of the papers recently obtained from the French archives and appended to this report. The motives and action of the French negotiators in their opposition to the contested American claims are therein fully disclosed.

WAR CLAIMS.

In the Webster argument of 1836, it was declared that the question involved in the consideration of the claims was "essentially a judicial question; not a question of public policy but of private right" between the Government and the claimants, a position absolutely necessary to include insurance company claims along with those of individuals; for the insurance companies must stand upon a ground of legal right, and not of mere moral obligation or general considerations of equity.

In the course of his speech Mr. Webster contended that there had been no public war between France and the United States in 1798 and afterwards; that France had acknowledged in negotiation the validity and justice of the claims; that we discharged France from paying the claims in consideration that she would discharge us from the old treaties between the two countries, and that this bargain was worked out or produced by the American Senate in expunging the original second article of the treaty of 1800. The conclusion drawn from these premises was that our Government had made itself liable to the claimants, including insurance companies, and should appropriate $5,000,000 to be distributed pro rata among them.

Inasmuch as the first advisory report of the Court of Claims upon the general question of governmental liability is mainly based upon the propositions of that speech, and follows the lines of observation contained therein, an examination of the speech will be virtually an examination of that report, and will dispense with the necessity of formally subjecting the report to analysis and reply.

The first proposition of the speech, that there were only "disturbed relations" between us and France prior to the treaty of 1800, but no actual war, must be abandoned in all present and future debate; for the evidence which proves the contrary has been produced and is decisive. There was actual public war between the two countries in 1798 and afterwards, suspended by consent on both sides pending negotiations in 1800, and completely terminated by the treaty of 30th of September of the same year.

The war was limited in extent though not in character, because it was mostly maritime, being confined to the ocean; but within the sphere of its operations, as to the subjects it embraced, the laws of war applied to it with complete force. It superseded treaty regulations of commercial intercourse between the two countries, and in its prosecution the losses suffered by individuals on either side were without redress, unless provided for in the treaty of peace.

It follows that the treaties of 1778, if otherwise existing, were abrogated by war, and that the claims now in question, being mostly war claims, claims for losses incurred from hostile force upon the ocean and prize condemnations on land, had no legal validity as demands against France. They might be properly made the subject of negotiation at the end of the war, but the true argument at such a time for their allowance would be that France had been wrong in the war and should pay indemnities to those who had suffered by her misconduct—an acknowledgment which France could not be expected to make.

Our envoys did not venture to make this argument; they proposed mutual indemnities, not upon one side, but upon both; from which, as our claims exceeded those of France in amount, would result a balance in our favor. They were driven to this position by necessity, and throughout the negotiation were embarrassed by standing upon false ground. War was mildly described as "a misunderstanding," until the French negotiators threw off the mask near the end of the negotiation (12th September) and declared, in substance, that in their opinion the claims were barred by war, and they did not intend to pay them.

[French plenipotentiaries to American envoys, 11th August, 1800.]

At all times the ministers of France, in acquiescing in this annihilation of treaties, can not conceal that the act by which the United States have declared their nullity has been a just provocation of war; that the hostile acts which have followed this provocation, those which have been nullified with so much éclat even since the French Government had caused every pretext of complaint on the part of the United States to cease, have been war itself. That France disguised the true state of her relations with the United States when she recognized them as a simple, temporary, and reparable misunderstanding; in a word, that a new treaty between France and the United States ought, before all, to be a treaty of peace. From this observation, therefore, it appears to them that the two Governments should no longer occupy themselves with their respective accounts, considering that the right of war dispenses with repairing its ravages, and that the honor of the national arms forbids even to be employed about them, since that state which should have a balance to pay the other in discharging it would acknowledge a conqueror and would purchase a peace.

[Journal of American envoys, September 12, 1800. Conference with French negotiators.]

They (the French plenipotentiaries) now openly avowed that their real object was to avoid by every means any engagement to pay indemnities, giving us as one reason the utter inability of France to pay them in the situation in which she would be left by the present war. The subject of the modification of the guaranty was now particularly pressed in the manner agreed. The conversation on this subject closed by a declaration of the president of the French commission (Joseph Bonaparte) that such a modification could not be acceded to without new instructions; that they had no power to assent to such stipulation; but that if the Government should think proper to instruct them to make a treaty on the basis of indemnities and a modified renewal of the old treaties, he would resign sooner than sign such a treaty, adding that if the question could be determined by an indifferent nation he was satisfied such a tribunal would say that the present state of things was war on the side of America, and that no indemities could be claimed. The other two commissioners made similar declarations.

And in the communication of our envoys to John Marshall, Secretary of State, dated at Paris, October 4, 1800, they repeat this statement as to the final position assumed by the French negotiators. They say that the latter declared "that it was indispensable to the granting of indemnities not only that the treaties should have an unqualified recognition but that their future operation should not be varied in any particular for any consideration or compensation whatever. In short, they thought proper to add, what was quite unnecessary, that their real object was to avoid indemnities, and that it was not in the power of France to pay them."

The case of Talbot vs. Seeman appears in 4 Dallas, page 34, having been argued at August term, 1800. It was reargued at August term, 1801, and the opinion of the court, by Chief-Justice Marshall, is contained in 1 Cranch, page 1. The case was that of the ship Amelia, of Holland, a neutral power, which sailed from Calcutta, in the East Indies, in April, 1799, loaded with productions of that country and bound to Hamburg. The ship was captured 6th September, 1797, by the French national corvette La Diligente, a prize-master and French sailors were placed in charge of the captured vessel, and she was ordered to St. Domingo to be judged by a prize court according to the laws of war. The Amelia had on board eight iron cannon and eight wooden guns when captured. On 15th September, 1799, the Amelia was recaptured from the French by Captain Talbot, of the Constitution, who ordered her into New York for adjudication, and in subsequent legal proceedings claimed salvage for her rescue as the condition of her return to her owners. This claim was eventually sustained by the Supreme Court, the opinion by Judge Marshall being elaborate and based mainly upon the fact that a state of war existed at the time of recapture between the United States and France under the several acts of Congress relating to France passed in 1798 and 1799. He said:

"In order to decide on the right of Captain Talbot it becomes necessary to examine the relative situation of the United States and France at the date of recapture [15th September, 1799]. The whole power of war being, by the Constitution of the United States, vested in Congress, the acts of that body can alone be resorted to as our guides in this inquiry. It is not denied, nor in the course of the argument has it been denied, that Congress may authorize general hostilities, in which case the general laws of war apply to our situation, or partial hostilities, in which case the laws of war, so far as they actually apply to our situation, must be noticed."

He then proceeds to cite and examine four acts of Congress authorizing and regulating hostilities against France upon the ocean, and an act passed 3d March, 1800, relating to salvage in certain cases of recapture, and holds:

"That 'one direct and declared object of the war, which was the protection of the American commerce, would as certainly require the capture of such a vessel [as the Amelia] as of others more determinately specified.'"

He then cites the decree of the French Government of 18th January, 1798, which ordained "that the character of vessels relative to their quality of neuter or enemy shall be determined by their cargo. In consequence, every vessel found at sea loaded in whole or in part with merchandise the production of England or her possessions shall be declared good prize, whoever the owner of those goods or merchandise may be;" and declares that under that decree there was danger of condemnation of the Amelia by France, from which danger the recapture saved the vessel.

Further extracts from the opinion are as follows:

"America did remonstrate, most earnestly remonstrate to France, against the injuries committed on her, but remonstrances having failed she appealed to a higher tribunal, and authorized limited hostilities. This was not violating the law of nations, but conforming to it. In the course of these limited hostilities the Amelia has been recaptured."

* * * * * * *

"It is not the authority given by the French Government to capture neutrals which is legalizing the recapture made by Captain Talbot: it is the state of hostility between the two nations which is considered as having authorized that act. The recapture having been made lawfully, then the right to salvage on general principles depends on the service rendered."

He also speaks of the time "before hostilities between the United States and France were terminated by a treaty," evidently meaning the treaty of 30th September, 1800.

In this opinion the Chief-Justice plainly uses the term "hostilities" as synonymous and interchangeable with the word "war." But what is most material to our present purpose is the announced doctrine that the laws of war took effect in a case of partial hostilities, such as then existed, so far as they applied to the situation.

In the case of Bass vs. Tingy (4th Dallas, 37), which was heard by the Supreme Court at the August term 1800, the four judges of the court present delivered opinions seriatim (Chief-Justice Ellsworth being absent in Europe as one of our envoys in the negotiation of the treaty), in which they held, in substance, that the relation of public war existed between the United States and France, although it was mainly confined to hostilities upon the ocean, and that France was in legal contemplation, as well as in fact, the enemy of the United States. Although this was a salvage case, involving only the question of individual right to compensation for the recapture of an American vessel which had been taken by a French privateer, it involved the general question of the existence of war between the two countries.

Concurrent with the foregoing opinions of the Supreme Court was that of the American envoys (including Chief-Justice Ellsworth), expressed in their communication to the Secretary of State, dated 4th of October, 1800. They said:

"Doubtless the Congressional act authorizing the reduction of French cruisers by force was an authorization of war, limited in its extent, but not in its nature.

"Clearly also, their subsequent act declaring that the treaties had ceased to be obligatory, however proper it might be for the removal of doubts, was but declaratory of the actual state of things."

THE OLD TREATIES WERE BROKEN BY FRANCE AND ABROGATED BY THE UNITED STATES.

1. By the French decree in 1793 and the seizures under it, and by the Bordeaux embargo. American property was taken by force and appropriated to public use, in most cases upon promises of payment unfulfilled until 1803-'04. In some cases no payment has ever been made. These seizures were in the nature of forced loans, produced great hardships, and were in plain violation of the treaties of 1778.

2. By the French decree of 1796, by which the commercial treaty of 1778 was openly defied, and the main advantages to America therefrom destroyed; under which decree pillage and confiscation of our merchant ships and their cargoes was authorized and carried out upon a large scale upon the European coasts, on the ocean, and in the West Indies.

3. By other French decrees which, openly abandoning amity and commercial right, as defined and guarantied by the treaties of 1778, made war upon our commerce, letting loose thereon the public war ships and innumerable privateers of France, whose seizures were followed by prize condemnations in French tribunals upon land, and appropriations of property to glut the rapacity of the captors and of the French Government.

Now, independent of the question of public war in 1798 and 1799, and its effect upon the old treaties, we have in this record abundant evidence that those treaties were over and over again broken by France in their material provisions, with most disastrous consequences to the commerce and interests of the United States. Practically and in fact France set the treaties aside, refusing to be bound thereby, and substituted for them her own lawless will. By the plainest rules of justice they could not thereafter be held to operate in her favor or to have any continued existence, except by the acquiescence and consent of the United States. And public law in this case follows the rule of justice and gives to it an effectual sanction. As contracts, the treaties being broken in their material provisions by France, no longer bound the United States in 1798, it was not at all necessary for the United States to resort to war to rid herself of their obligations; she was already freed and discharged therefrom by the action of France.

It was under these circumstances that our Congress passed the declaratory act of July 7, 1798, which was as follows:

"An act to declare the treaties heretofore concluded with France no longer obligatory on the United States.

"Whereas the treaties concluded between the United States and France have been repeatedly violated on the part of the French Government, and the just claim of the United States for reparation of the injuries so committed have been refused, and their attempts to negotiate an amicable adjustment of all complaints between the two nations have been repelled with indignity; and

Whereas under authority of the French Government there is yet pursued against the United States a system of predatory violence, infracting the said treaties, and hostile to the rights of a free and independent nation:

"Be it enacted, etc., That the United States are of right freed and exonerated from the stipulations of the treaties and of the consular convention heretofore concluded between the United States and France, and that the same shall not hereafter be regarded as legally obligatory upon the Government or citizens of the United States."

That act was good law when it passed, and it still remains among our statutes to define and fix conclusively and forever the position of our Government toward those ancient treaties with France. In brief, those treaties had been shamefully broken and set aside by France, and they were formally abrogated by us on the 7th July, 1798. Thenceforth they had no obligation, validity, standing, or force as treaty contracts between France and the United States.

It is thus established that by the separate but concurring action of both Governments, as well as by actual war waged between them, the old treaties had no legal existence in the year 1800. They were defunct and could be revived only by a new agreement between the parties. But the negotiation of any new agreement which should revive them was expressly forbidden to our envoys by their instructions from the Department of State (October 22, 1799), and the prohibition was classed among the ultimata of the negotation. The prohibition was in the following language:

"That the treaties and consular convention, declared to be no longer obligatory by act of Congress, be not in whole or in part revived by the new treaty; but that all the engagements to which the United States are to become parties be specified in the new treaty."

The old treaties, the revival of which was thus forbidden, had been already spoken of by the Secretary of State in a prior part of the same letter of instructions, were, after referring to certain articles of the commercial treaty of 1778, he added:

"The dissolution of that and other treaties with France leaves us at liberty with respect to future arrangements."

It is clear, then, that not only were the old treaties dead treaties, but our envoys had no power to revive or restore them, and were, in fact, forbidden to do so; and it is equally clear that they obeyed their instructions and did not attempt to usurp a power they did not possess.

There is, therefore, no foundation in truth for the assertion, so often and boldly made, that the American claims were given up or abandoned to get rid of the old treaties; and much less for the still more extreme and groundless assertion that the claims were set off against the obligations imposed upon us by those treaties. Equally unfounded is still another form of assertion, that a surrender by France of the old treaties was the consideration, and a valuable one, for the surrender of the American claims.

There were no treaties or treaty obligations in force at the end of hostilities in 1800 which were valuable to France or onerous upon us and which it was our interest and desire to escape. The treaties had gone down amid scenes of violence, pillage, and bloodshed upon the ocean, followed by confiscation and outrage on land; they had been broken by French decrees, carried into ruthless execution by French officials and employés, and their utter abrogation had been rightfully pronounced by the law-making power of the United States.

THE OLD TREATIES.

Having shown that the old treaties were extinct at the time of the negotiation in 1800, it follows that all claims by France under them, as continuing obligations, were merely pretenses, unfounded in fact and in law. Bonaparte himself correctly described them as "pretensions" in ratifying the treaty of 1880, and such was undoubtedly their true character. Nor was it allowable for France to allege that prior to the abrogation of the treaties by Congress, on July 7, 1798, she has suffered wrongs from the United States for which she was entitled to redress. She was estopped by her own conduct and acts from taking that ground, and, besides, the allegation was untrue. Neither the Washington proclamation of neutrality of December 3, 1793, nor its subsequent enforcement, nor the Jay treaty of 1795, nor any failure of the United States to defend the French islands of the West Indies from capture, nor restrictions upon French war vessels or privateers in American ports, authorized France to make reclamations, demands, or complaints against the United States in the treaty negotiation of 1800; nor were any pretensions by France on either of these grounds ever acknowledged by the United States to be just.

1. The Washington proclamation of neutrality in 1793 was the exercise of a clear national right, and did not violate any treaty obligation with France. Nor did France object to that proclamation when issued, and the conduct of her minister, Genet, in antagonism to it subsequently, was not supported by his own Government; on the contrary, he was recalled.

2. The Jay treaty, ratified in 1795, was one which the United States had a right to make, and the making of it was a necessity to the United States in the circumstances in which they were placed. It has been characterized as unfriendly to France; it was greatly contested in a memorable debate in the House of Representatives, and was reluctantly accepted by our Executive as containing the best terms then obtainable from one of the belligerent powers. Passing into the field of political controversy, it was greatly decried, bitterly denounced, but it was accepted by Jefferson as preferable to the alternative of war, and impartial history must approve his judgment.

It is said that that treaty extended privileges in American ports to British vessels which were inconsistent with certain exclusive privileges of French vessels under the seventeenth and twenty-second articles of our commercial French treaty of 1778. But upon this point the answers given to France by Mr. Pickering, Secretary of State, and by Mr. Monroe, our minister at Paris, are in the main sound and satisfactory, and leave no material ground of complaint undisposed of which would impeach the good faith and fidelity of the United States. The Jay treaty in its twenty-fifth article reserved the prior treaty rights of France, and although there were British encroachments upon both French and American rights, as defined by treaty and the law of nations, which greatly embarrassed our foreign relations, we yet maintained toward France consistently the position of a just and friendly power. It was only in subsequent years, under the pressure of actual hostilities waged by her against us, that our attitude toward her was changed.

3. Nor were the United States in fault in not protecting the French West India islands from British capture and occupation. The mutual and reciprocal guaranties of the eleventh article of the treaty of alliance with France of 6th February, 1778, were never broken or violated by the United States. No demand was made by France upon the United States to defend the islands from capture, nor to assist her in defending or recapturing them, without which we were under no obligation to interpose in their defense or for their restoration. The treaty did not require us to volunteer aid to France, but to yield it when required. The argument, then, does not rest merely upon the ground that we had no sufficient naval power or military force to prevent the capture of the islands or to restore them by force, but upon the higher and better ground that France did not call upon us to execute the guaranty obligation. And that she had a good and sufficient reason for withholding such demand has been clearly shown in the third general report of the Court of Claims. It is manifest that it was to her interest and according to her desire that we should remain a neutral power and furnish her with provisions and other supplies, which she sorely needed in the great wars in which she was engaged. But interference in the West Indies by the United States meant our embroilment in a war for which we were unprepared, and the certain destruction of our rights, privileges, and position as a neutral nation.

There were therefore no grounds upon which France could claim, in the negotiation of 1800, that prior to the treaty repeal of 7th July, 1798, we had broken our treaties with her and made ourselves liable to account to her for injuries arising therefrom. Much less could it be claimed that the acts of Congress in 1798 and 1799, which abrogated the old treaties and authorized hostilities against her, were unwarranted, or that those acts of Congress did not establish the relation of war between the two nations and wholly extinguish the treaties. In fact, the one argument France could soundly make, and did finally make through her negotiators on the 12th September, 1800, was that the relation of the two nations was the relation of war, and that, of consequence, no indemnity for losses could be claimed.

THE MADISON EXTRACT.

The advocates of these claims have placed great stress upon an observation made by Mr. Madison in a letter of instructions to Mr. Pinckney, our minister to Spain, in February, 1 04, in which he said that the claims "were admitted by France," and that their release by us "was for a valuable consideration in the corresponding release of the United States from certain claims on them." And it is probable that this passage from Mr. Madison's correspondence is the source of the argument so often made in behalf of the claims, and which it has been one object of the present paper to answer. It is not claimed that Mr. Madison expressed any opinion upon the main question of the liability of the United States, but the extract from the Pinckney letter appears favorable to the claimant's argument.

The remarks of General Dix upon this point in his speech of 1846 (Speeches, volume 1, page 97) may be consulted with advantage in this place, but the best and the decisive answer to Mr. Madison's observation upon the treaty of 1800, is that it was inaccurate, and that it must have been made without due examination of official correspondence, and without the exercise of that cautious, deliberate judgment which commonly preceded and characterized his expression of opinion upon public questions. All this is plainly apparent upon a review of the negotiation which led up to the treaty of 1800, and of the circumstances attendant upon the amendment and ratification of that treaty as they have been detailed or referred to in the present report.

It is to be remembered that Mr. Madison retired from Congress at the close of the session of 1796-'97, and was absent from the seat of Government until the summer of 1801, when he assumed the duties of Secretary under President Jefferson. The treaty had then assumed its final form, and there was no occasion for exploring the mass of papers relating to it, although on file in his Department. The negotiation of the treaty belonged to the past; the instrument was to be taken and executed as it had been made. But it is quite conceivable that a certain amount of prejudice or of bias against the preceding administration and all its works was entertained by the men who came into power by virtue of the exciting and heated election of 1800. Was not the surrender or abandonment of American rights, and particularly of American claims by the French treaty, a topic of complaint in that election, of assault upon the Adams administration and the Federal Senate? Political parties are not always just to each other in great election contests.

These considerations tend to abate that confidence in Mr. Madison's observations about the treaty of 1800 which might otherwise be indulged in by us, and naturally lead to an examination of those facts of historical record by which that observation will be supported or overthrown. But this examination having been already made by General Dix in his Senate speech of 1846, and also made in the present report, need not in this place be again entered upon or pursued.

Another point relied upon as pursuasive evidence in favor of the claims is the large number of reports from committees of Congress during the last fifty years. Here again the speech of General Dix (Speeches, volume 1, page 63) may be referred to, in which he explains fully the manner and circumstances under which those reports have been procured. They have been uniformly referred to friendly committees, and when the proper standing committee has been known to be adverse a select committee has been asked for and obtained, as was the case at the Senate session of 1846. Thus, by withholding the spoliation bill from unfriendly committees and always sending it to friendly and selected ones, a large number of favorable reports may be accumulated in process of time, without, however, adding any real strength to the argument in support of the claims.

RÉSUMÉ.

Upon the whole question of Government liability for the claims we have come to the following conclusions:

First. That upon the argument for the claimants, accepting that argument in its full force, the claimants would be entitled to claim against the United States only the pecuniary value of their claims as claims against France at the date of the amendment of the treaty of 1800 by the United States Senate, and that the claims were then of no appreciable value to the claimants under the original second article of that treaty, and would never have been admitted or paid by France if no amendment of the treaty had been made.

Second. That the abandonment of the further prosecution of the claims by the United States was not a release of the claims for a valuable consideration or equivalent received from France, or in the nature of a set-off of the claims against the obligations of the old treaties of 1778:

a. Because there was simply a giving up or abandonment by us of negotiation, present or prospective, and not an agreement about, or settlement of, acknowledged demands on either side.

b. Because there was no valuable consideration to us in a French abandonment of the pretension that the old treaties were still in force, for those treaties had been broken by France in their material provisions, had been for that reason lawfully and justly abrogated by us, and, besides, they had been extinguished by actual war.

Third. There were no counter-claims of France, just in themselves or acknowledged by us, founded upon the Washington neutrality proclamation of 1793, the Jay treaty of 1795, or upon the guaranty and port-privilege provisions of the treaties of 1778.

Fourth. The breaches by France of her treaties with us, set forth in the preamble to the treaty-abrogation act of Congress of 7th July, 1798, are truly stated therein; and that act, based upon those breaches, was a rightful and valid exercise of power by us under the law of nations, and removed all ground of claim that the old treaties had any validity, force, or operation after that date.

Fifth. The evidence is now made complete by papers from the French archives in connection with official papers of our own Government heretofore published, that in the negotiation of the year 1800 the French negotiators did not acknowledge the validity of the American claims now in controversy or propose or intend their payment; that their pretension about the continuance of the old treaties made to our envoys was not made in good faith or sincerely, but to embarrass negotiation, and while excluding claims recognition or negotiation, to secure to France the advantages of restored amity and reciprocal trade with the United States.

Sixth. That by persistent negotiation, several times renewed, and by resort to actual defensive war against France upon the ocean, the Government of the United States performed its whole duty to the claimants, securing to them, as far as possible, protection against seizure and confiscation of their property, restoration of many ships and cargoes by virtue of the treaty of 1800, and allowance of their claims to an amount of several millions of dollars by the same treaty, which were afterwards paid to them in the adjustment of the purchase-money for Louisiana.

Seventh. That the amendment of the treaty of 1800, by the United States Senate, in the striking out of the second article thereof, was not an assumption of claims payment by our Government, nor an appropriation of private property to public use, but was an exercise of political power by the Senate, presumably in good faith to the claimants, and for the following substantial reasons, to wit:

1. Because it was apparent upon the evidence before them that France would not voluntarily pay the contested claims, and could not be compelled to pay them by the exercise by us of any practicable means of coercion or force.

2. Because, by the contemporaneous opinion of our Supreme Court, the relations between the two countries had been, as contended for by France, a relation of war, which, arguendo, barred claims for losses suffered on either side during its continuance. Added to these considerations was the additional one, that the article, if retained, would be mischievous, because it would hold out false, delusive hopes to claimants which in all probability could never be realized.

APPENDIX.

C. P. Claret Fleurieu, councillor of state, to the minister of foreign affairs.

PARIS, LE 22, Prairial, An. 10 (June 11, 1802).

CITIZEN MINISTER: * * * I do not know what other kinds of claims to indemnity can be made by the United States, for in all the course of the negotiation there was never a question on the part of their plenipotentiaries of any but those which individual Americans believed they had a right to make for vessels which they pretended to have been captured contrary to the law of nations; because they supposed that the United States could declare war on the French Republic in pronouncing the abrogation of the treaties, but that for all that the state of war had not existed. This pretension on their part requires no answer, and if one was necessary it is found in the letter you have done me the honor to write me.

You saw at the time, citizen minister, by the accounts given you by the French plenipotentiaries and notably by that of 7 Vendémiaire, year 9, that the negotiation was to take and had taken successively different directions; for the American plenipotentiaries did not always follow the same line, and we were forced to follow them in their excursions to study the motives of each change and to oppose constantly to their pretensions, which changed only in form, measures which would bring us to our aim, that of refusing decisively all indemnity in money.

To attain this end, to their demand of indemnity for which they presented themselves armed with documents, we opposed the demand for the re-establishment of the treaties in their integrity. We had clearly forseen that they were not authorized to and that they never would consent to this demand. The treaty which the United States had concluded with England, subsequently to ours, not to mention considerations of less importance, opposed to this an obstacle which may be called invincible; but their refusal would authorize us to refuse, and the balance being established, if we demanded the re-establishment of the treaties, if we made much of the guaranty stipulated by these treaties, for the failure to execute which the United States had given us a right to demand ourselves a larger indemnity, this was not because we regarded that re-establishment as very advantageous to France, but it was our arm of defense and of attack, and in order to put as much force in claiming it as our adversaries put advantage in refusing it.

After long discussions, sometimes lively enough, whereof the principles and details are known to you, citizen minister, we arrived at a solution which may be regarded as a mezzo termine, which fully satisfied neither party, but which, if it did not recognize the rights of their respective claims, seemed at least to reserve them in leaving an opening for an ulterior negotiation upon the reciprocal pretensions.

In effect, article 2 of the convention recalled the treaties without rendering them obligatory for the moment, and postponed to another time the negotiation, both as to the treaties and as to the indemnities mutually due or claimed. By this arrangement we reserved to ourselves to return to the treaties if the Americans ever wished to return to the indemnities by the demand they could make for a reopening of negotiation. In plain terms, article 2 of the convention is nothing but an indefinite postponement, but that postponement is to our advantage, for, having stipulated in the convention of the 8th Vendémiaire all that can truly interest us as to our commercial relations, as well as the safety and property of French citizens in the United States, we can leave in oblivion some articles of ancient treaties either practically indifferent or whose execution, such as that of the article which stipulates the guaranty by the United States of our possessions in America, is, properly speaking, but a matter of words and of illusions. The Americans, on their side, clearly foresaw, thoroughly felt, that they would never obtain even a discussion of the indemnities, still less their payment, and they profited by the occasion to exonerate themselves from treaties, which in various circumstances might give rise to difficulties in negotiations they wished to open either with England or with other powers.

Such was the state of affairs at the signature of the convention; such it was well understood on one side and the other to be; and if it is not presented thus clearly and expressed in a manner thus explicit, this was from condescension, so to speak, and to arrange things for the American plenipotentiaries, who appeared to dread exceedingly the clamors of the ship-owners and merchants of the United States, if the convention should stipulate a formal renunciation of indemnities.

FROM JOURNAL OF FRENCH NEGOTIATORS.

[Translation.]

Conference 4 Vendémiaire, An. 9 (September 25, 1800).

This conference has been very important for the objects treated of in it. The American ministers demanded of the French ministers whether they had any articles to propose; for themselves, they said, they had nothing further to ask; they had finished as to what concerned the United States and their interests.

The French ministers answered this interpolation by remarking that the stipulations thus far arranged were limited to regulating affairs of the moment and for the existing war; that such an arrangement restrained within such limits had only a transitory aspect; that the questions of neutrality were themselves decided only according to this transient and limited view; that this was leaving the relations of the two States on an incomplete and arbitrary basis, putting in the prospect a compulsory and necessary return to the question of indemnities and treaties, which the one party and the other well understood they were abandoning forever (entendait bien abandonner pour toujours); that it was necessary, and that the dignity of the two states required that they should treat on the essential matters commonly contained in treaties of commerce, excepting stipulations truly commercial, which for the moment the French Government preferred to omit; in fine, that the ministers of the Republic desired a treaty of amity and commerce complete in form and in title.

The ministers of the United States were vehemently opposed to this pretension. They reminded us that the negotiation, since we had agreed upon the basis of their note of 19 Fructidor, had proceeded upon the theory of a provisional arrangement, and could not be given an aspect as extended as we wished to give it; that they had positively expressed in that note that, the discussion of indemnities and treaties being postponed, the next thing was to make a temporary arrangement under the name of convention; that this basis had been agreed to; that their instructions forbade them to make a treaty in which indemnities were not stipulated for; that they absolutely could not consent to the propositions of the French ministers, and if insisted upon the negotiation would be once again broken off. According to these principles they rejected the article concerning successions; that concerning the establishment of a consular system; that concerning the proclamation of peace and friendship, a formula by which all treaties of amity and commerce commence; in fine, all that which went beyond the present and the absolutely necessary. They added that all the stipulations to be introduced could only turn upon matters of common right, which needed no treaties to sanction them.

The French ministers in turn became warm; they insisted on the indecency of a transaction which bore all the marks of ill-humor and dislike; that it was not becoming in the United States to rigorously oppose that article and to appear to reject the friendship of France, and to repulse her from the circle of nations allied by treaty, leaving her to the law of nations, pure and simple; and that France would not likely pass over the sentiments which that wish and the transaction which would result from it would cause all Europe to understand; that it was time for confidence to take the place of jealousy, to dissembled ill-will, to all kinds of uncandid views, and that to persist in dispositions which bore only that character was to respond very ill to the frankness and the earnestness which the French Government had not ceased to display through its ministers in the negotiation; in fine, leaving considerations of propriety for those of interest, that whatever exalted notion the United States may have conceived of their future power and their influence, they could not so diminish in their own eyes both the strength and influence of France as to regard her with utter indifference, and believe that no time would ever come when that influence could be of service to them.

The American ministers withdrew to deliberate, and the French ministers, remaining by themselves, were confirmed by discussion in the opinions they had expressed and sustained with so much heat.

The American ministers having returned to the conference-room, declared that they could not accept the title of Treaty of Amity and Commerce; they would not refuse to discuss any articles the French ministers might present; they would voluntarily yield as to the realities, but they could not yield as to the names of things. They represented that it would be to sacrifice their personal consideration to push any further the abandonment of all indemnity; that under the form of a convention, although it was quite real, it was, however, less absolute, and preserved some appearance of dignity; that the word "treaty" once pronounced, they would have to drink the chalice heretofore agreed about. From these considerations, from which they could not depart, and which they submitted, inasmuch as they were personally interested, to the fairness of the French ministers, they offered to split the difference and give the treaty the name of Amity and Commerce, the word "treaty" to be qualified and softened by the word "provisional."

The French ministers took this proposition under consideration. They considered that from the manner in which the American ministers expressed themselves it was to be believed that if their hands were really tied, as they said (which, indeed, was very doubtful, considering the declarations of that kind which they had falsified in the course of the negotiation), it would at least be personally disadvantageous to them to yield on this point in the present state of the negotiation, and upon the terms to which it was reduced we ought to make mutual concessions, there being no more capital points on which it was absolutely necessary for one of the parties to yield. These points were embraced in the abandonment of indemnities, in the assurance of equality with other nations for our privateers, in the restitution of vessels of war, and very recently in the consent that the treaty might contain all the usual stipulations of a treaty of amity and commerce.

We had now the realities: was there any very strong reason to insist on mere forms? Ought we to insist on having the word "treaty" pure and simple? This was to risk delays and to push one's advantages too far. It was necessary, then, to choose between the word "convention" and that of "treaty" qualified. The word "convention" conveys the idea of a very limited transaction both as to time and scope; it applies to stipulations concerning a single point and to a passing moment. The expression applies perfectly to the arrangement as the American ministers had proposed to make it. It no longer was appropriate after they had abandoned their idea and admitted all the ordinary stipulations of treaties. The qualification by the word "provisional" did not alter the sense of the word "treaty," since every day treaties are limited to five, six, or twelve years. On the contrary, the present treaty had no term, although having the qualification of provisional; it had a character more permanent than the majority of treaties, and this provisional treaty would last as long as there was no agreement to make an end of it.

This was, then, to give the American a pure satisfaction of words, while we had the irrevocability of the treaty assured as a reality. One could raise difficulties only on account of the odium attached to the word "provisional" during the mutations and vicissitudes of our Revolution, where every administration for a long time was provisional. But in English it was not this sense; and if it is necessary to abandon words on account of the sad use made of them in the course of our agitations, it will be necessary to stop speaking. Finally, the qualification suited the idea which the ministers had often conceived, not to appear to abandon absolutely the treaties, and this idea agreed with that of the Americans of preserving some appearance upon the sacrifice of the indemnities. From all these considerations we preferred the word "treaty" with the qualification of "provisional" to the title of "convention," because there was no example of such a word being applied to treaties as extensive as the present one, and because that generic expression had originally in public law but a limited signification, and had been replaced by the word "treaty." The French ministers returned and consented to the word "provisional." This discussion terminated, we drew up the articles which are in the treaty, the first, seventh, tenth, and twenty-fourth. * * * L. A. PICHON.

BUSINESS FROM COMMITTEE ON THE POST-OFFICE AND POST-ROADS.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask, by unanimous consent, that Tuesday week, immediately after the reading of the Journal, be set apart for the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT]?

Mr. BURROWS. Why do we not have a report from the Committee on Rules fixing days for each of these committees, including the Committee on Invalid Pensions, so that we may have some pension legislation? It seems that by this process we are going to shut out the Committee on Invalid Pensions entirely. I must object.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The Committee on Invalid Pensions has every Friday evening.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. BURROWS. I will not object to the request, Mr. Speaker, if we can have unanimous consent for a day to be set apart for the consideration of general pension legislation. [Cries of "Regular order!" on the Democratic side.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND. My friend from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] forgets that the Committee on Invalid Pensions has every Friday night.

Mr. RYAN. That is only for private pension bills.

Mr. BURROWS. Unless that can be done, I give notice that I shall object.

LIENS OF JUDGMENTS, ETC.

Mr. HENDERSON, of North Carolina, submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8180) to regulate the liens of judgments and decrees of the courts of the United States, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate and agree to the same.

JOHN S. HENDERSON,
WILLIAM E. FULLER,
JOHN H. ROGERS,
Managers on the part of the House.
JAMES F. WILSON,
WILLIAM M. EVARTS,
J. Z. GEORGE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. HENDERSON, of North Carolina. I submit, on behalf of the House conferees, a statement of the effect of the action of the conference committee.

The bill as amended reads as follows:

An act to regulate the liens of judgments and decrees of the courts of the United States.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That judgments and decrees rendered in a circuit or district court of the United States within any State shall be liens on property throughout such State in the same manner and to the same extent and under the same conditions only as if such judgments and decrees had been rendered by a court of general jurisdiction of such State: Provided, That whenever the laws of any State require a judgment or decree of a State court to be registered, recorded, docketed, indexed, or any other thing to be done, in a particular manner, or in a certain office or county, before a lien shall attach, this act shall be applicable therein whenever and only whenever the laws of such State shall authorize the judgments and decrees of the United States courts to be registered, recorded, docketed, indexed, or otherwise conformed to the rules and requirements relating to the judgments and decrees of the courts of the State.

SEC. 2. That the clerks of the several courts of the United States shall prepare and keep in their respective offices complete and convenient indices and cross-indices of the judgment records of said courts, and such indices and records shall at all times be open to the inspection and examination of the public.

SEC. 3. Nothing herein shall be construed to require the docketing of a judgment or decree of a United States court, or the filing of a transcript thereof, in any State office within the same county (or parish in the State of Louisiana), in which the judgment or decree is rendered, in order that such judgment may be a lien on any property within such county.

The question being taken, the report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON, of North Carolina, moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TARIFF.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of bills raising revenue.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. SPRINGER in the chair) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the pending amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out lines 362 and 363, as follows:

"All tobacco in leaf, unmanufactured and not stemmed, 35 cents per pound."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I desire to be heard further upon this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is recognized and will proceed.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I move to substitute what I send to the desk for the lines under consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out lines 362 and 363, inclusive, and insert instead:

"All leaf-tobacco contained in any package, bale, box, or in bulk, or shipped in any form whatever, any part or portion of which is suitable for wrappers, if not stemmed, 75 cents per pound; if stemmed, $1 per pound, on the whole contents of such package, bale, box, or bulk of tobacco."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No better illustration of the evils which this bill seems designed to work can be found than in the paragraph under consideration. This paragraph reduces the duty on a class of tobacco which competes with that grown in the States of Connecticut, Massachusetts, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Wisconsin.

The history of the growth of this industry and its relation to tariff legislation presents an interesting and instructive lesson in protection. In 1875 the value of the crop was little more than $7,000,000; in 1880 more than eleven and a half millions, and in 1886 something over $13,000,000.

In my own State and Congressional district the crop in 1885 (the last census year) was as follows:

Tobacco crop—1885.

	Acres.	Value.
State of Wisconsin	29,594	$2,959,462
Third Congressional district, Wisconsin	13,408	1,351,075

From the first this crop promised new resources to agriculture. As I have stated, its cultivation had attained a substantial and encouraging development nearly ten years ago. In the States named the farmer turned with new hope and zeal from the overworked soil of his large grain fields, turned from his reduced yield and depressed market to the cultivation of a few acres of tobacco as well. This diversified his labor. It yielded employment almost the year round. It reduced competition and pressure in the old lines of production, and so benefited agriculture in all the States. It laid heavy burdens of expense upon the beginner, but it offered fairly liberal returns, and where soil and climate seemed favorable it was tried and began speedily to fulfill its promise. The farmer came to feel a confidence in the situation. He soon understood the cultivation of the crop; he knew his market. It was a home market; it was a reliable market. It depended upon a constant and "increasing consumption" upon which he could calculate. He felt secure.

But foreign capital saw its opportunity. Directly under the equator lay a group of islands belonging to the Netherlands, washed on one side by the Pacific Ocean, on the other by the sea of China. On one of these islands were gathering the forces, directed by a rich and powerful syndicate, destined to reach half way round the earth and pluck the American market away from the American farmer. Upon that island they had discovered that they could produce a peculiar tobacco-leaf, small, flexible, thin as tissue-paper, fine as silk. It did not matter that it was inferior in all other respects to the American leaf, that it did not burn so well, that it did not taste so well. In working up as a wrapper for cigars it proved cheaper than the American leaf, and therefore the cigar manufacturer would buy and use it instead. This foreign syndicate found that they could grow three crops a season; that they could employ cooly and Chinese labor at 7 to 10 cents per day; that they could cultivate, harvest, and prepare the leaf for the market at a cost—taking into account the peculiar quality of the tobacco—which would absolutely displace 4 pounds grown by the American farmer with every pound they could raise and ship from this island of Sumatra.

Mark what followed! In 1880 only 38 pounds of that tobacco found its way from the Netherlands to the United States. The following year 200,602 pounds, the next it more than trebled, running up to 782,763 pounds, and by the next year, 1883, the enormous amount of 3,818,931 pounds came from the same source to crowd four times that amount, or nearly 16,000,000 pounds, grown on our own soil out of our own market.

The farmers could not stand the competition, and they appealed to Congress to increase the tariff on this tobacco. For a score of years all unmanufactured leaf-tobacco had paid a duty of 35 cents per pound, but these new competitors paid that duty and laughed at the trifling obstacle it offered to their advancing monopoly. There was at that time a Republican administration and a Republican Congress, and the appeal was heard and responded to. In March, 1883, a law was passed designed to increase the duty on leaf-tobacco suitable for wrappers from 35 to 75 cents per pound. In this House it received the vote and support of Republican members, and met the opposing influence and vote of Democratic members.

The effect of the increased protection given by that Congress was at once manifest. The importations of Sumatra tobacco decreased more than three and a quarter million pounds. It really seemed that our own market was to be given to our own farmers. They were encouraged, not because the law gave them a subsidy or bounty, not because of any advantage given them over any competitors on our own soil, but because the law furnished a protection against a foreign article produced by cheap labor under different circumstances and conditions. They returned to the cultivation of this product. They re-enforced their skill with intelligent experiment. They invested their money. They built tobacco barns and store-houses. They increased the quality and value of the American product—not to the depression of the market, but by a healthy and normal growth.

But no one had suspected the power, the determination, the dishonesty of the foreign enemy. The law had been framed to apply to the foreign leaf as it was then produced, assorted, packed, and sold.

As enacted, and as it now stands, it reads as follows:

Leaf-tobacco, of which 85 per cent. is of the requisite size and of the necessary fineness of texture to be suitable for wrappers, and of which more than 100 leaves are required to weigh a pound, if not stemmed 75 cents per pound; if stemmed $1 per pound. All other tobacco in leaf unmanufactured and not stemmed, 35 cents per pound.

Under that law, as this tobacco was then produced, assorted, packed, and shipped to this country, it would substantially all be subject to the 75-cent rate, as it was and is practically all suitable for wrappers. It was the intention of Congress that it should pay the higher rate. It was to secure the protection which the higher rate gave to the American farmer that the law was passed.

Almost immediately the foreign importers sought to evade the statute. By its terms the tobacco must meet two requirements to be assessed the higher or 75-cent rate. It must be:

First. Leaf tobacco 85 per cent. of which is suitable for wrappers; and Second. More than one hundred leaves must be required to weigh a pound.

Avoiding either test it would escape the 75 and only pay the 35 cent rate of duty.

The first attempt to evade the law was by invoicing. The tobacco was shipped from Sumatra to Amsterdam, where out of the entire invoice of say one hundred packages or bales of wrapper-leaf tobacco sixteen bales or packages would be replaced with inferior tobacco not "suitable for wrappers," so that less than 85 per cent. of the invoice would be suitable for wrappers. This was anticipated and met at the custom-house at New York by Treasury Department ruling that the invoice would not be taken as the unit on which to compute the per cent., but that each bale of wrapper-leaf must pay the 75-cent rate.

Then came a new and more successful fraud. Each bale or package weighing, say, 200 pounds, was opened at Amsterdam and a number of the little bundles of leaves, called "hands," of which the package or bale is composed, weighing about 37 pounds, were taken out and 37 pounds of tobacco not suitable for wrappers substituted, thus reducing the percentage of wrapper-leaf in each bale or package below 85 per cent.

This was followed by the decision of Secretary Folger, May 1, 1884, directing the custom-house inspector to break open bales or packages and assess the wrapper-leaf at 75 cents per pound. These lawless invaders of our market carried their opposition to the courts, protracting the fight, and contesting the enforcement of the law openly as well as secretly. The decision was sustained.

Then this syndicate carried the cheat down to the collection of leaves in the "hands." Their labor is so cheap that they can afford any expenditure of it to beat the law. They then placed leaves enough not suitable for wrappers into the little bundle or "hand" to bring the percentage of wrapper-leaf below 85 per cent.

In August last Assistant Secretary Maynard ruled in accordance with the decision of Secretary Folger that the bale or package or "hand" is not the unit under the law, but that the "leaf-tobacco suitable for wrappers" must pay the 75-cent rate without reference to the form or vehicle of shipment.

The slow and laborious process required to collect this duty renders the existing law exceedingly difficult of enforcement. Since 1884 the evasions under it have been simply enormous. The total amount of this tobacco entered for consumption from the Netherlands at the New York custom-house for the last three years is as follows:

Year.	Total number of pounds entered at 35 cents per pound.	Total number of pounds entered at 75 cents per pound.
1885	2,217,917	88,016
1886	4,000,519	29,994
1887	4,213,336	28,756

This discloses the fact that the great bulk of this tobacco only pays the lower or 35-cent rate.

When it is remembered that every single pound of it displaces 4 pounds of that grown in this country it will be seen that in both 1886 and 1887 these foreign gentlemen took away from our own farmers the market for more than 16,000,000 pounds, or more than one-fourth of the annual crop of American wrapper-leaf.

The effect of this unfair and unlawful appropriation of our market has been to give this industry a most serious injury and discourage and dishearten those engaged in the business. I know farmers in my own neighborhood who have old crops of two and three years on hand awaiting buyers who do not come. In a single year the crop fell off 3,000 acres in Wisconsin. Great and expensive tobacco barns and store-houses stand empty or only partially used, while a crop which ought to have a permanent and prominent place with the farm staples maintains a doubtful and uncertain existence.

How is it with the Sumatra competitors? The question is scarcely necessary. Paying next to nothing for the hands employed, they are able to expend so much labor in the cultivation, selection, and assortment of the leaf that they rule the market and gather in certain and large profits.

Hon. Isaac Bell, jr., our minister at The Hague, in a communication to Secretary Bayard December 22, 1885, notes the fact that—

Some of the Sumatra tobacco companies had declared annual dividends of over 100 per cent.

And I am informed that in 1887 their profits were nearly 200 per cent.

The producers of American wrapper-leaf tobacco have pressed this matter for consideration in Congress with great earnestness for the last three years. Until very recently they have not succeeded in getting the party in power here to make any audible answer to their urgent appeals. A few weeks ago, however, the New England Homestead published the reply of the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee [Mr. MILLS] to a request to clear the present law of the clauses which make its evasion possible and leave the rate at 75 cents per pound. I read what the gentleman [Mr. MILLS] said in response to that request from the farmers:

A NOTE FROM MR. MILLS.

[New England Homestead, Saturday, May 19, 1888.]

* * * * * * * *

On the subject of tobacco we can not accept your request. Thirty-five cents per pound is a high enough duty on tobacco; 75 cents is prohibition and no revenue, and we can not afford to destroy our foreign trade in tobacco or any other article. The Sumatra tobacco is now smuggled in at 35 cents.

R. Q. MILLS.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, Washington, D. C.

In this note it will be observed that the gentleman says that "75 cents is prohibition and no revenue." What does he mean by that? Does he want more revenue? Have not the people been told through all these weary months that ruin could only be averted by reducing the revenue at once? And now the gentleman refuses relief in this instance on the ground that the rate asked by the producer of this product of the soil will prohibit the importation of Sumatra tobacco and have the disastrous effect of producing no revenue. For that reason he condemns it. No plea is advanced by him that Sumatra tobacco is one of the much talked of "necessaries of life," and for that reason the duty must be reduced, but the farmers are told in a curt little note that the 75 cent rate if retained and enforced will keep the Sumatra tobacco out altogether and yield no duty to the Government—that it is "prohibition and no revenue." To one industry these gentlemen say, "We lower the duty because the revenue must be reduced." Here the duty is reduced to increase and insure revenue. This bill puts vegetables on the free-list because they are necessaries of life, and because the accumulation of the surplus must be stopped; and it reduces the duty on Sumatra tobacco because it is a luxury and because the present rate enforced will not assist in increasing the surplus.

But the gentleman assigns another reason. He says "we can not afford to destroy our foreign trade in tobacco or any other article." Here is the chronic trouble with the free-trader. He can see nothing near to him. His vision is peculiarly defective. It renders him totally blind to what is going on around him in his own country, while the dreamy "far-sightedness" which keeps his gaze constantly fixed on distant foreign objects plays strange tricks with his processes of reasoning.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] says "we can not afford to destroy our foreign trade in tobacco." He entirely ignores the importance of our home trade in tobacco. It appears to be a matter of utter indifference to the gentleman how quickly and completely this shall be annihilated, but Heaven save the "foreign trade in tobacco." It gives him no concern that our farmers have on their hands one-fourth of the wrapper crops of 1886 and 1887 awaiting a market which has been appropriated by this imported tobacco. It does not worry him because the foreign syndicate has more than $8,045,505 of money which should have gone to our own people, who have instead their unsold crops. He is happy because he has the "foreign trade" in Sumatra left. This "foreign trade in tobacco" with the Netherlands must be saved at any sacrifice. And yet it all amounts to just this: that for every single dollar which they leave in this country in that trade they take three dollars out. This is the "foreign trade in tobacco" which the gentleman would buy at the cost of an important agricultural industry. Sir, it is too high a price to pay for the luxury.

But the gentleman has still another reason. He says the "Sumatra tobacco is now smuggled in at 35 cents."

True, Mr. Chairman, a great quantity of it is smuggled in at 35 cents, but does that furnish a reason for reducing the tariff? Are laws to be repealed because they are evaded or defied? Is there to be a premium put on crime? Why should these foreign law-breakers be rewarded?

Here the issue is at last distinctly made. Let there be no more misunderstanding. Here is a contest between the American farmer and the foreign smuggler, and the gentleman from Texas arrays himself and his party against the farmer. He takes away from the agriculturists of the United States a promising industry and bestows its valuable and coveted market on the Netherlands. He smites with heavy hand the plain, patient, toiling supporters of this Government, and generously gives millions to rich foreign syndicates employing labor scarcely a grade above absolute slavery. And this is a fair sample of Democratic tariff revision.

Mr. Chairman, ever since the beginning of the Forty-ninth Congress I have tried to secure the amendment to the existing law which I have offered to this paragraph.

There is no ambiguity in its terms. It would put an end to all attempts to violate the law. Under it if the tobacco were mixed, as it now is to cheat the Government and steal into our market, "the entire bale, box, package, or bulk" would be assessed the higher rate of duty. This would be the imposition of such a penalty as the importer would be careful never to invite or provoke. Though urged since the first days of the Forty-ninth Congress, the Democratic Ways and Means Committee of the last House and this have persistently refused to report that bill for the relief of this industry.

And after all the protests and pleading for the tobacco-growers this tariff bill was reported here containing a proposition to take away from them even the imperfect protection afforded by the present law. Though only a portion of this tobacco pays the higher rate, when all ought to pay it, still the winding, devious course which the importer has to pursue to perpetrate his cheat and sneak through the custom-house, is in itself something of a hindrance and check to the importation. But the bill, as it came from this Democratic Committee on Ways and Means, proposed at one stroke to reduce the duty on all leaf tobacco to 35 cents per pound.

Now, at the last moment, there is a sudden change in the attitude of the committee—not that they are more friendly to the farmers who produce the domestic leaf, but that they evince a little less zeal for the Sumatra producer. The gentleman from Texas now moves to strike out these lines in the bill and leave the present law unchanged. Why does he do this? It surely can not be that he wants to give our tobacco-growers the protection of a 75 cent rate of duty, because he says in his letter which I have just read that—

> Thirty-five cents a pound is a high enough duty on tobacco.

It is not because he wants the Sumatra importers to pay the higher rate of duty, for he says in the same letter that—

> The Sumatra tobacco is now smuggled in at 35 cents.

Of course if the law is unchanged it will continue to be "smuggled in at 35 cents." If friendly consideration for this great American interest moved the gentleman he would not oppose and with all the other gentlemen on that side vote down my amendment, which would stop the smuggling he admits is practiced now. No; but an explanation for this action I think can be found in the necessities of the political situation. The farmers of Connecticut cultivate annually about 8,000 acres of this tobacco. They with other growers want protection; they want the law changed so there can be no evasion; they do not want the paragraph in this bill now under consideration. It is against the principles and practice of the Democratic party to give them this protection. So gentlemen on the other side refuse to change the law and stop the smuggling.

But as the absolute necessity of carrying Connecticut in order to elect a Democratic President has lately become so apparent the gentleman from Texas shrinks from the responsibility of further angering the farmers of Connecticut just at this time. He shrinks from putting into his bill the affirmative proof of his hostility to protecting the tobacco growers. He shrinks here on the eve of this great political contest from thus openly relieving the Sumatra importers of the trouble of mixing and packing their tobacco to evade the law. By refraining just now from making the law a little harder on the Connecticut farmer and a little easier for the Sumatra importer, gentlemen on the other side hope to be able to make enough of a show of friendliness to hold on to the farmer vote until after the 6th of November.

Mr. Chairman, I saw an interesting paragraph in the New York Sun a few days ago, taken from the St. Paul Globe (Democratic) of July 9. It was entitled "Mills and Vance Lock Horns Again." This time it was not about the paragraph on "wood-screws," but it was over this very clause on leaf tobacco now under consideration. The paragraph concluded with the statement that Congressman VANCE said to-day openly:

> Unless that clause is stricken out we can not hope to carry Connecticut.

It is just possible that this may explain the strange motion which the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] now makes to strike out the clause.

The clever and genial gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. VANCE] may succeed in making his Democratic constituents believe that he rendered them a valuable service in persuading the gentleman from Texas that it was not safe this year to declare openly in the tariff bill against our tobacco-growers, but if he has power enough with his Democratic friends on the Ways and Means Committee to work this change, I apprehend that his farmer constituents will ask him to explain why he did not secure some amendment to the law that would be of value to them; why he did not secure an amendment that would stop this foreign competitor from smuggling in annually 4,213,336 pounds of Sumatra at 35 cents a pound to crowd four times that amount of American leaf out of the market.

Mr. Chairman, I trust that the time has at last come when the farmers, not only of Connecticut but of the United States, will plainly understand that their interests are not with a party that would ruin its home industries to build up a "foreign trade."

You Democrats have the majority here. You have the power to change this law and give the farmers the relief they ask, and you refuse to do it. It is your fixed purpose to give this with other American industries over to your foreign idol. You may ignore petitions and refuse to listen to all pleas here, but, gentlemen, there is another court and another day, and from your tyrannical majority both here and in committee we appeal to the people.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired. Does the gentleman withdraw his formal amendment?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. BAKER, of Illinois. I renew it.

[Mr. BAKER, of Illinois, withholds his remarks for revision. See APPENDIX.]

Mr. MILLIKEN. Mr. Chairman, the double-headed proposition made by our Democratic friends upon the wool question is amusing in its absurdity. They tell us that to put wool on the free-list will give the farmer higher prices for his products and at the same time afford the people cheaper woolen blankets and clothing. Just how a finished article is to be made cheaper by increasing the cost of the material of which it is composed they do not explain, though they have been many times in this House challenged to do so. Indeed, the proposition would seem to the ordinary human intellect to be the climax of nonsense.

But our friends on the other side are in a desperate situation. They want the votes of the laboring man, so they argue to him that the duty on wool is just so much added to its cost, and as a consequence so much added to the cost of his blankets and clothes, and hence in his interest it should be repealed.

But our Democratic friends want the votes of the farmers and wool-growers also, and so they argue that by striking off the duty which protects them from competing with cheap wool grown by foreign cheap labor and on cheap lands the price of wool will be advanced.

You see how well they suit them to the necessities of their condition. It is true they say this in defiance of all logic and common sense, but when was the time when the Democracy was not equal to the cheeky and impudent task of endeavoring to make the people believe that black is white and white is black if their case appeared to demand it?

There can be no doubt that the repeal of the duty on wool will make the price of wool higher, but not to the American wool-grower. It will be the American consumer of wool, the laborer, and others, who buy blankets and woolen cloths who will pay the higher price. For when the duty on wool shall be repealed the cheap wools of Australia and South America will flow into our markets and so reduce the price of American wool as to drive our farmers to slaughter their flocks. By that means the fleeces of forty-four million American sheep will be lost to us. That alone will necessarily enhance the price of wool. We shall also by that means be left entirely to the mercy of foreign wool-growers, who will make such prices as they please.

That is the true picture of what the free-trade Democracy have in store for both the farmers and consumers of the country—the destruction of the product of the one and the increase of price to the other.

But one other serious question arises in this connection. If the wool industry in America is protected and our farmers are encouraged to increase their flocks, so as to afford us wool for our wants, where will the money go which paid for it? It goes to our own people. It remains here to be circulated among our people and thus increases the volume of our currency, while if the duty is repealed and the industry is destroyed we shall buy abroad, send our money abroad to pay, and so decrease our circulating medium. And what is true in this respect of wool is true of all our products.

The more we produce at home the more of the people's money we shall keep at home for their use. Every new industry created among us is a source of wealth to the people. Every industry destroyed leaves a gap to be filled by foreign producers and opens the way to sending the people's money out of the country.

This fact demonstrates the utter absurdity of the declared purpose of the Mills bill—that is, to reduce the revenue so as to prevent any further surplus accumulating in the Treasury. This was the reason given by the President, and is the reason or excuse given by the free-trade Democracy in this House for assaulting the industries and labor of the country.

When we have remonstrated against placing lumber on the free-list we have been answered that there is a great surplus in the Treasury which threatens a business panic and general financial disaster.

When we ask that building stone, vegetables, fish, and fifty-three important industries in the North be not sacrificed or given over into foreign control to enrich people not owing allegiance to our flag nor paying any of the expenses of our Government, we have been met with the same reply, and so have we been when we have resisted the reduction of duties upon our manufactures and farm products in the North to so low a figure as to place our people in unequal competition with cheap labor on our northern border and across the sea. Although, when we have raised our voices against taxing the people $60,000,000 to maintain a small industry in Louisiana which has never produced more than one-tenth of the sugar the country consumes, and when we ask why rice should pay a duty of 100 per cent. in order to protect a few rice-growers in South Carolina and Georgia, though it is shown that by placing these two articles on the free-list the revenues would be sufficiently reduced to prevent any further accumulation of surplus in the Treasury, the only reply we get is a solid vote of the Democracy in the House to retain these extraordinary duties.

The truth is that the reduction of the surplus is not the purpose, but the pretense of the Democratic free-trade party. It is made a cloak to cover the attack of that party upon Northern industries except in some few favored Democratic districts. The surplus has grown up under a Democratic administration. Purposely it has been allowed to accumulate when under existing law it might have been applied, and now it is sought to be used as a menace to frighten us into the ranks of free-traders.

But this scheme will not work, for every intelligent man knows that the Mills bill will augment to indefinite dimensions the very danger which its friends pretend to fear.

What danger is there in the accumulation of a surplus of revenue in the Treasury? What is the hurtful effect which it may have upon the country? How can it produce business panic and financial disaster? Only in one way certainly, that is by keeping out of circulation the money which should be among the people.

I would like to see the surplus disbursed, and I would gladly vote for a sensible bill which would accomplish that purpose without injuring our industries. But such a bill will have to be framed by the friends of America, by men who believe in her institutions, in the independence of her position, in the genius of her people and the power of her workingmen, in all pursuits, to make her the producer of all that her wants demand. Yes, by men who know a better way to distribute her surplus than the Mills bill provides, which is to send it across the sea to fill the treasuries of foreign nations and the pockets of foreign manufacturers; for all that the distribution of our present surplus would increase the volume of our circulating currency would be but a fraction of the amount which our circulation would be decreased by our loss of the money which the Mills bill would send out of the country to purchase foreign manufactures and products to take the place of those which the destruction of our industries would prevent us from furnishing at home.

The gentleman from California a few days ago presented the tables which show that notwithstanding the surplus has increased in our Treasury, the circulation of money among our people has at the same time increased from month to month. How has this occurred? It is wholly due to protection, which has kept our mechanics and farmers and all our producers at work and thus kept our money at home.

Should the Mills bill become a law, how long would it be before the balance of trade would be against us? How long before the volume of our money pouring out of our country to foreign lands to buy what we now produce would exceed by twofold the surplus which runs into our Treasury? Whatever the disadvantages of the surplus may be I would rather risk it in our own Treasury, where it is the property of our own countrymen, than in the pockets of British merchants and manufacturers who are, if not the enemies, certainly are the competitors of our people in the great battle for national prosperity and progress.

The effect of low duties, amounting practically to free trade, upon the volume of money among the people was so keenly experienced and bitterly felt by our forefathers during the time of the Confederation that it should never be forgotten, but remain in men's memories as a sad and salutary lesson to those who would see their country cursed by such mischievous legislation as the free-trade Democracy propose to enact in the Mills bill.

Then our forefathers had what this bill provides in part at least and what the Democrats in this debate have again and again urged and argued for—practical free trade. What was then the result? Cheap goods flowed in from Europe; the money of the people poured over the sea to pay for them, until all trade became barter. There was no currency left for circulation in the country; people trafficked in cattle and sheep and most everything, except silver and gold coin or any kind of money.

The general disaster which fell upon all classes and every kind of industry has formed too many sad pictures in the descriptions of statesmen and historians to admit of repetition here. It was arrested only by the formation of a Constitution for all the colonies, the establishment of a new and stronger Government, and the enactment of a protective tariff which encouraged new industries that gave labor to the people and kept their money at home.

The same principles will operate to-day as then. Like causes will produce like effects, and it will be found always that in a country where labor is high, as in our own, the best assurance of a sufficient volume of currency is that protection to domestic industries which shall give employment to the toilers and stimulate the development of all the varied resources with which God has enriched the nation. Under such protection our country has had a degree of prosperity unknown in the history of mankind. Let us maintain it, whether it be assailed by the theories of doctrinaires, old prejudices, sectional envy, or the alliance of British greed with Democratic ambition for political power.

Mr. FORAN. Mr. Chairman, while the general debate was pending I gave my views, at considerable length, upon the measure under consideration. Since that time the bill has been so modified and amended that many of the objections I then entertained against the proposition no longer exist. There still remain in the bill, however, a few important provisions and sections, which are so utterly at variance with my convictions of duty and the pledges made my constituents that I can not consistently or conscientiously vote for it. I regret this exceedingly because it has always been my aim and my desire to be in line with my party upon all important questions of public policy. Besides, the "condition" mentioned by the President in his message to this Congress still confronts us. Our patriotism as citizens and our official oaths alike require and demand at our hands the solution and removal of this "condition."

The collection by the Government and retention in the United States Treasury of a sum annually equal to one dollar for every man, women, and child in the Republic can not long continue, except at the cost of the most direful consequences to the prosperity and business interests of the country. The contraction of the circulating medium of a country always results in enhancing the value of money, while it invariably decreases the wage of the laborer. The "condition"—the surplus—ought to be and must be removed, and at once. The Mills bill seeks to accomplish this result. It diverges, in a few essential details, from the line of policy I would follow were the entire responsibility upon me; yet I am not prepared to say that the Ways and Means Committee, upon the whole, especially in the amendments allowed since the bill was introduced, have not honestly endeavored to formulate and perfect a bill that would relieve the people from unnecessary burdens and at the same time do justice to the various conflicting interests of our greatly diversified industries.

If the committee failed in some instances it is because the tariff question, in the very nature of things, can not be delocalized or nationalized. I had hoped that our friends upon the other side of the Chamber would formulate and present a measure that would more nearly meet my views; but in this hope I have been disappointed. Their policy has been to point out alleged defects in the bill in speeches, which were not calculated or intended to create a healthy public opinion or sentiment upon the vital and the main question—the reduction of the surplus—but which were calculated and intended solely to influence and affect and create Republican sentiment for the November election. Much as I differ with the majority of my party upon the tariff question, I can not consistently, as a Democrat, aid the Republican party in creating an issue that is illusory and misleading.

The present condition of the Treasury—the surplus and the giant evils it is bound to precipitate upon the country—brings us face to face with a public, not a political question. This question is so grave and far-reaching and so liable to affect injuriously the best interests of the whole people, that it ought to be approached, discussed, and considered by patriots, not partisans; it is above and beyond mere party considerations. The Republican minority, however, have not seen fit to so regard it. The President's message was hailed by Republican leaders, not so much in the light of a menace to the industries of the country as in the light of outlining a policy which they believed they could, by judicious twisting and appeals to local prejudice, turn to their advantage politically. These gentlemen will vote against this bill, not because they honestly believe it is a vicious measure, but because some injudicious utterances by gentlemen on this side of the House will enable them to tell their constituents it is a free-trade measure, and in support of that contention they will cite, not the bill itself or its contents, but the remarks of gentlemen who have supported it.

How any bill which provides for average duties of 40 per cent. can be called a free-trade measure passes human comprehension; but that fact will be carefully obscured by the bewildering denunciations which will be hurled at the bill and the Democratic party, because a few gentlemen have permitted themselves in the discussion on this bill to indulge in the glittering generalities of free-trade philosophy. Now, while I can not vote for this bill, for the reasons already stated, I certainly can not have any sympathy with the opposition to it, which springs from the selfish and partisan motives which dominate the Republican party.

To vote against the bill would be to countenance and commend the unpatriotic and selfish policy of the Republican party. My own party fealty as well as my convictions of right and duty make such action impossible. I have, by my votes, entered my protest against those items in the bill which my judgment lead me to believe were illogical or wrong, while I have uniformly voted for all items, clauses, and sections I believed to be sound and right. I am sorry the bill is not in such shape as would prompt me to vote for it, but it is too near my position, and the opposition to it is of so selfish and purblind a character that it is impossible for me to vote against it.

One word more. As a Democrat, I do not regard the tariff as a party question. It is local in character, a business question that should be dealt with in a non-partisan spirit.

The principles of the Democratic party are too broad, too deep, too far-reaching to be even temporarily put out of sight for a question that, in details, is far better understood by manufacturers and merchants than by statesmen. The difference between the two great parties now contending for supremacy in this country is as vast and as wide as space. I am a Democrat. I mean by that, as I said upon another occasion, that a Democrat is a

FREE RESPONSIBLE SOUL.

A Democrat is a man who would increase by all lawful means, to the highest attainable limit, the power of the individual, without sacrificing the requirements of public order; he believes that there should be no inequality of condition except that which springs from the inequality of talents, and he aims at removing all inequality except such as is absolutely necessary to the progress and development of humanity; he believes that men are responsible solely as men, have rights simply because they are men, and should be valued solely as men, and that every man has the right to raise himself to the highest point of excellence of which his soul and mentality are capable. In a word, the Democrat believes that merit is everything, birth nothing.

Politically a Democrat is a citizen who believes in a government by the people, while a Republican is a citizen who believes in a government of the people. The Democratic citizen believes in the largest possible limit of direct popular control in the government, consistent with social order and progress, while the Republican citizen would limit and circumscribe this direct popular control, believing that better government can be secured by placing governmental power only in the hands of the so-called well-born or privileged class. Again, the Democratic citizen believes in limiting the powers of the Federal Government and conserving to the States, at all hazards, every right and power reserved to them by the Constitution. In other words, the Democrat would maintain the binding force of the exact literal language of the Constitution, and would oppose at all times, by all means, the enlargement of Federal powers by interpretation. The Republican believes in the reverse of all this. Here is the correct, the exact dividing line between the two parties.

It is upon these lines that I have always contended that the wage-worker, the toiler, and the man of limited means is out of place in the Republican party. The traditions and the inherited principles of the Republican party are those of Hamilton, while the Democrat believes in the teachings of Jefferson. Parties sometimes swerve from the straight line of principle and follow the devious line of expediency. The Democratic party is no exception to this rule. Parties are merely aggregations of men, and all men are selfish, and the prospect of present success often lures them from the path that leads to a success which may be remote, but is always certain.

Through all the trials, through every crisis of the Democratic party, the principles upon which it was founded by Jefferson always survived, for principles never die. The party may have erred, it may have swerved from its path, but its faith, its principles as above outlined, are as pure and as just to-day as when first the lovers of free popular government made them the creed and dogmas of a political party. Here is a platform upon which all Democrats can stand. Questions of expediency and policy—side issues—sink into obscurity and insignificance when contrasted with the great essentials of human liberty upon which the Democratic party is founded. Divergence of opinion upon questions of party expediency furnish no excuse for desertion to the enemy. While I will not vote for this bill, while I could not vote for it under any circumstances in its present shape, yet will I be found this fall—and at all times while life lasts—in the ranks of my party, in the forefront of the fight for Democratic ascendency and the perpetuation of Democratic principles in this Republic. I can see no hope for the people in Republican ascendency. If the principles of the Democratic party are sound—based on justice and right—and so I believe, I feel it my duty to combat errors into which it may fall from within, not from without.

The CHAIRMAN. There being no objection, the formal amendments will be withdrawn. The Clerk will read the pending paragraph under consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

All tobacco in leaf, unmanufactured, and not stemmed, 35 cents per pound.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on striking out the paragraph which has been read, the motion having been made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS].

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HITT. What has become of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] on yesterday.

The CHAIRMAN. It has been disposed of.

Mr. MILLS. I move, on page 29, line 1 of section 4, to strike out "July" and insert "October;" so as to read:

SEC. 4. That on and after the 1st day of October, 1888, in lieu of the duties heretofore imposed on the articles hereinafter mentioned, there shall be levied, collected, and paid the following rates of duty on said articles severally.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPINOLA. I move, on page 32, to strike out lines 86, 87, 88, and 89, as follows:

Pipes, pipe-bowls, and all smokers' articles whatsoever, not specially enumerated or provided for, 50 per cent. ad valorem; all common pipes of clay, 25 per cent. ad valorem.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to going back to that paragraph?

There was no objection.

The question recurred on Mr. SPINOLA'S amendment, and it was adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the next paragraph, which was passed over at the suggestion of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH].

The Clerk read as follows:

Bonnets, hats, and hoods for men, women, and children, composed of hair, whalebone, or any vegetable material, and not specially enumerated or provided for, 30 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. BYNUM. Before we proceed with the debate on that paragraph I ask to move a mere formal amendment on page 58, which is a part of the repealing clause.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 24. That sections 3011 and 3013 of the Revised Statutes be, and hereby are, repealed as to all importations made after the date of this act; and all laws and parts of laws inconsistent with the other requirements and provisions of this act are also hereby repealed.

Mr. BYNUM. I move to strike out the words:

And all laws and parts of laws inconsistent with the other requirements and provisions of this act are also hereby repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the paragraph passed over on motion of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH], which has already been read, and the Clerk will now report the amendment moved by Mr. LEHLBACH to that paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the paragraph the following:

"Buttons called by and known among manufacturers as pearl buttons, a specific duty of 4 cents per line per gross (English measurement)."

Mr. MILLS. I ask that debate on this paragraph be limited to two hours, one hour on each side.

Mr. REED. I object. I think we had better go on with the five-minute debate.

Mr. MILLS. I ask that an hour be given on this side.

Mr. REED. I object.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Possibly an hour will not be needed.

Mr. MILLS. We gave twenty minutes yesterday to the other side and fifteen minutes this morning, and I do not see why gentlemen should object to the time asked for on this side.

Mr. BUCHANAN. But my colleague desires to speak to a substantial amendment, and I suggest that the gentlemen wait until my colleague gets through before fixing the limit.

Mr. MILLS. I am perfectly content that the gentleman shall have all the time he wants within reasonable limits.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands objection is made.

Mr. SPRINGER. I wish to submit a request for unanimous consent to the House, and with a view of doing so I submit a formal amendment to strike out the last word of the pending paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. DOCKERY). The gentleman from Illinois will proceed.

Mr. SPRINGER. I have listened with great patience to all gentlemen in this House during all of this long and protracted debate, and I believe that during this discussion every gentleman has been permitted to speak as long as he desired. I now ask the indulgence of the committee that I may be permitted to address myself to that part of the bill which relates to the tariff on wool, with the assurance that I will confine myself exclusively to that subject; and I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted, after the gentleman from New Jersey shall have concluded his remarks, to address the committee for a period not to exceed one hour.

Mr. REED. It does not seem to me to be a fair proposition after the debate is closed that a gentleman should come here with a prepared speech and ask additional time for the purpose of delivering it. Had we been notified a reasonable time in advance it would have been granted, and probably would have been granted with the greatest pleasure. But I do not think it is desirable now to reopen the subject.

Mr. SPRINGER. On the subject of wool permit me to state that gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber occupied one hour and forty-five minutes more than was occupied on this side; and this order, if granted, would not even equalize the debate on that question. I have no desire to depart from the legitimate subject under consideration or indulge in any political matters.

Mr. MCMILLIN. If the gentleman from Illinois will yield to me for a moment I will remind my friend from Maine that the gentlemam from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] was given fifty minutes consecutively, as a matter of courtesy to him and that side of the House, on this schedule—the woolen schedule—uninterruptedly, within ten minutes of the time asked by the gentleman from Illinois on this side.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state the request of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. REED. If there is a proposition for an hour on each side I should not make special objection to it, after having called attention to the way that this thing is done. I do not think it is a satisfactory method of doing business in committee.

Mr. MCMILLIN. The first request of the gentleman from Illinois was for an hour.

Mr. REED. And I objected to the first request.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman from Maine object to two hours, then, one on each side?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will submit the request to the committee.

Is there objection to allowing debate for two hours on the woolen schedule of the bill, that time to be equally divided between the two sides of the House?

There was no objection.

Mr. SPRINGER. Now let the gentleman from New Jersey occupy such time as he desires on his amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the gentleman from Maine will be allowed to control the hour on the left. Does the gentleman desire to proceed now?

Mr. REED. No; the gentleman from Illinois will take his hour first.

Mr. SPRINGER. After the gentleman from New Jersey has concluded his remarks I will proceed.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Of course I know nothing of this arrangement. The time should be given me to offer two substantial amendments, which I propose and on which I ask to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will send his amendments up.

Mr. REED. This does not come out of any time that we may have on this side under the new arrangement.

The CHAIRMAN. It does not. The time occupied by the gentleman from New Jersey will be on his own amendments.

Mr. BLAND. That is, for five minutes, under the rule?

The CHAIRMAN. Of course the gentleman occupies the floor, if at all, under the rule.

Mr. BLAND. But I understand it is only for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. He speaks under the rule of course. If the gentleman gets more time that will be by the consent of the committee.

Mr. LEHLBACH. My first amendment is to strike out "thirty," in line 26 of this paragraph, and insert "fifty;" so that it will read "50 per cent. ad valorem."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment at the request of the hatters of my district, and it seems to me, after having considered their reasons for this change, that it would be wise to increase the duty on these articles. I will briefly state to the committee the facts. The consumption of these articles in this country is not so great but that those engaged in their production are able to supply the demand. Until within the last ten years few hats were imported, and our workingmen engaged in this industry were kept busily employed. Of late years the importation has steadily increased, and where formerly an imported hat was a novelty, it is now a thing of common use. These large importations have had the result of lowering the wages of those employed, and of compelling idleness at certain portions of the year. In order to prevent further increase in importation it will be necessary to increase the duty on these articles. This is the effect of my amendment, namely, an increase from 30 to 50 per cent. I had the honor to present a petition to the House, signed by 2,170 hatters of my district, asking for this legislation.

In a letter inclosing the petition Mr. Daniel McCarthy, of Orange Valley, N. J., secretary of the United Hatters of Essex County, says as follows:

> Our reason for asking this legislation is that a few years ago an imported hat was a novelty, but now they are seen everywhere, and the importation is yearly on the increase. Taking the importation of 1887 as a basis, the wages for making 42,365 dozen hats, which, at $8 per dozen, amounts to $338,920, is in reality $33 per annum each from the 10,000 people employed in the hatting industry in this country, or about one-sixteenth of the average earnings for the entire year. In this country alone there are nearly 4,000 men employed at hatting, who would all have signed the petition if the committee who had it in charge had taken a few days more to circulate it, but we were afraid to delay it. Now, we are compelled through lack of work to lose at least three months in the year which could be partly remedied by an increase to 50 per cent.

If the rate of duty is not changed the hatters fear that the importations will not decrease, but rather increase, and that it will condemn them to idleness for a longer period during the year. With this brief statement, I ask for a favorable consideration.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. LEHLBACH; and on a division there were—ayes 72, noes 84.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I now offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Insert after line 26:
> "Buttons, called by and known among manufacturers as 'pearl buttons,' a specific duty of 4 cents per line per gross (English measurement)."

Mr. LEHLBACK. Mr. Chairman, this amendment proposes a specific duty which will, as I am informed, be equivalent to about 50 per cent. ad valorem, or double the present duty. But a few years ago the pearl-button industry was a flourishing one in the city of Newark. The competition at that time was entirely with English manufacturers, and the duty of 25 per cent. was sufficient to make up the difference of wages between the two countries. At that time there were few or none manufactured in Austria. At present the importations to this country, according to the report of Consul-General Jussan, made December 30, 1887, amount, in round figures, to $2,300,000, and of this amount nearly $1,700,000 comes from Austria, the bulk of the balance coming from France. The hand labor in Austria, as well as in France, is performed at the low rate of from 5 to 7 florins per week (or from $2 to $2.80 per week). In the manufacture of pearl buttons no machinery can be used; it is all hand work. It is hardly necessary, therefore, to state that since this has become an industry in Austria and France, and the bulk of their manufactured articles have been exported to this country, that most of our manufacturers have been compelled to close their factories, and those yet remaining are engaged only part of the time, and then only at the highest grade of goods.

The petition which I will present to the House and ask to have read states that in Vienna and the suburbs there are several thousand convicts employed in making pearl buttons, and the sale of these goods being prohibited in Austria they are exported to the United States. If this be true, and I do not doubt it, then it is high time that we, having in most of the States protected honest labor from our own convict labor, should take steps to protect it from infinitely worse competition, the convict labor of Austrian prisons. This is not the first attempt that those engaged in this industry made to obtain relief. Six years ago my predecessor introduced a bill for their relief. It was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and nothing was done. In the last Congress I introduced a bill increasing the duty. It was referred to the same committee. A chance for proper explanation was given by that committee, but no tariff legislation being had during the Forty-ninth Congress, of course no relief was given. If Congress will not soon do something for these people an industry will be wiped out of existence which would in a short time have given employment to thousands of our people. This is a very peculiar case, and I hope that the petition of the committee of the pearl-button makers, which I now send to the Clerk's desk to have read, will result in causing favorable action.

The Clerk read the petition, as follows:

NEWARK, N. J., December 21, 1887.

HONORABLE SIR: The petition of the undersigned, who are a committee of the National Pearl-Button Makers' Association, appointed by them to present to your honorable self, praying that they may have your support in advocating a bill of the pearl-button manufacturers, which is about being presented to Congress, asking for such relief that will enable us to be on an equality with other mechanical industries in this country. We beg you to allow us to present to you a few facts, which we think, after your perusal, we shall have your support and sympathy.

We are a body of mechanics, who some ten or fifteen years ago represented thousands, our occupation was such that we were enabled to have steady employment, our principal competitor in pearl buttons was England, and the competition was such that we could favorably compete, but since that time Austria and Germany commenced making pearl buttons; and where there was one thousand gross of pearl buttons made in those two countries alone there are now to-day one hundred thousand, till the competition is so great that two-thirds of the workmen in this country are doing nothing, and what few have work, only get two or three days per week. The wages we get when at work averages from $12 to $15 per week, which we think you will agree is not too much for a skilled mechanic who has had to labor for several years before he becomes proficient, but as the case now is this labor has been entirely thrown away.

Our chief competitor now is Austria, as there we have not only the regular workmen to contend against but in Vienna and the suburbs there are several thousand convicts employed making pearl buttons, and there is a law prohibiting the sale of such goods in their own country, and which goods find a ready market here. Again, the wages of a regular mechanic in Austria are exactly in our money $2.83 per week, so you can readily see the comparison of the wages of the foreign and domestic mechanic. Our wages, taking it at the lowest basis, is four or five times as much as theirs, and the duty that is imposed on such goods is 25 per cent. ad valorem. Now it can readily be seen the disadvantage we labor under. How can our employers find work for us to do when importers in this country have their agents in Europe who buy goods that are the result of convict and pauper labor, or, in other words, how can it be expected that they will buy goods in this country of which the labor alone costs $1 when in a foreign country it costs 30 cents?

Things have gone so far with us that it is only a question of a little time when the climax will come. We have labored hard for a long time to keep the wolf from the door and looking with longing eyes for a bright sun to rise which would break forth into a glorious morning; but we have hoped in vain; the tide does not seem to turn, and as a last resort we appeal to you, most honorable sir, to help us in our great difficulty. We are well aware that Congress has the inclination to reduce the tariff instead of raising it, but we feel we are justified by our condition in asking that an exception be made in our case. In fact, our trade has been in such extreme necessity that the whole press of this mechanical city and the press of New York have taken it up and from observation have made prolonged articles upon it. Our employers are also in a bad condition; two-thirds of the factories are completely closed, and the others, on an average, do not run two days per week.

Now, honorable sir, we have endeavored to state our case to you in a plain and truthful manner, praying that you will give us your valuable assistance so that we can make an honest living at our own legitimate occupation, as we feel we have to work against more competition and have less protection than any other industry in the whole country, as our goods are made exclusively by hand and can not be made in any way by improved machinery; the same process of manufacture has to be gone through in Austria as in this country; and we can assure you that the contents of this letter we can vouch for, as a great many of your humble petitioners have followed their occupation in Europe.

The lathes that are used in this business can not be utilized for any other purpose, which is another great disadvantage we labor under; in fact, we labor under every disadvantage and have nothing to encourage us. We pray that you may see the condition that we are placed in and that something will be done at this session of Congress to give us that relief that will extricate us from our unfortunate position and enable us to support our wives and families as it becomes every honest and respectable mechanic. We do not ask for extortionate wages, but we pray for a duty which will protect us and give us steady employment.

Respectfully yours, etc.,

MICHAEL J. DEGNAN, Secretary.

To Hon. HERMAN LEHLBACH.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I simply wish to state that to my personal knowledge these facts are not exaggerated in this petition. The shops in my city have been closed for want of work and the people are walking the streets in idleness. It is simply a question here whether this industry shall longer exist in this country or not.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to ask the gentleman from New Jersey a question. This petition recites the fact that these men only get employment for about two days in a week. Is that a correct statement?

Mr. LEHLBACH. They do now; but they did formerly, when they were coming in competition with England alone, work full time at full wages.

Mr. BLOUNT. Does my friend mean to say that since Austria began to manufacture this class of merchandise, these persons have but two days work in the week?

Mr. LEHLBACH. That is substantially correct.

Mr. BLOUNT. How long has that been going on?

Mr. LEHLBACH. For the last six years. Most of the buttons sold in this country now are made in Austria.

Mr. BLOUNT. And that condition of your labor has existed for a series of years?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I will state to the gentleman that they make only the higher grades of goods here.

Mr. BLOUNT. And these people only find employment two days in the week?

Mr. LEHLBACH. In that industry. The balance of the time they are working in some other line of industry where they can get employment. Now, the question is whether you are going to strike that industry down or not.

[Mr. WHEELER withholds his remarks for revision. See APPENDIX.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH].

The question was put; and there were—ayes 67, noes 83.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, the debate on the pending bill began on the 17th day of April last; since that time the committee has been occupied in general debate twenty-three day and eight evening sessions. There were consumed in the general debate one hundred and eleven hours and fifty-four minutes—fifty-six hours and eighteen minutes by Democrats and fifty-five hours and thirty-six minutes by Republicans, or those opposed to the bill. In all one hundred and fifty-one speeches were made during the general debate on this bill. The debate upon the bill by paragraphs began May 31, since which time there have been occupied twenty-eight days or one hundred and twenty-eight hours and ten minutes, including the time that will be consumed to-day. The whole number of days devoted to the debate and consideration of the bill has been fifty-one, and the number of hours two hundred and forty. This debate will perhaps be known as the most remarkable that ever occurred in our parliamentary history. It has awakened an interest not only throughout the length and breadth of our own country, but throughout the civilized world; and henceforth, as long as our Government shall endure, it shall be known as "The Great Tariff Debate of 1888."

The House in Committee of the Whole on Monday last voted on the question of striking out of the pending bill the paragraph which placed all wools imported into this country after the 1st day of October next on the free-list. The vote by tellers showed that 120 members voted for free wool and 102 voted to retain the present tax. It was my intention before that vote was taken to have addressed the committee in opposition to striking out the paragraph; but on account of a slight cold I was unable to do so at that time without personal discomfort. But as the motion to strike out did not prevail, and the clause securing free wool still remains in the bill, and must be voted on as a part of it on the final passage, I beg the indulgence of the committee at this time to express some views on the subject.

CHANGE IN WOOL TARIFF IN 1883.

On the 3d day of May, 1882, I had the honor to address the Committee of the Whole House on the bill to provide for the appointment of the Tariff commission. In my remarks at that time I referred to the tariff on wool at some length, and advocated the placing of wool on the free-list. That Congress passed at its second session the tariff act of March 3, 1883, which slightly reduced the duty on wool. It repealed the ad valorem duty of 10 and 11 per cent., but retained the specific duty of 10 and 12 cents a pound on unwashed wool of the first and second class. The specific duty on coarse carpet wools was reduced one-half. It is claimed by gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber that these reductions worked disaster to the wool-growers of the country. I do not concede this. On the contrary, I hold that the reduction of the duties on wool did not produce the changes in the prices of wool or number of sheep which followed. First as to the number of the sheep in the country before and after the change, take the four years immediately preceding the change and the four years succeeding it. The act of 1883 took effect July 1 of that year. The number of sheep in the United States in 1883 was 49,237,291.

The number in each of the four years preceding this year was as follows:

	Sheep.
1879	38,123,800
1880	40,765,900
1881	43,569,899
1882	45,016,224
Total	167,475,823

Or on average of 41,868,955 sheep for each year.

The number in each of the four years succeeding the change was as follows:

	Sheep.
1884	50,626,626
1885	50,360,243
1886	48,322,331
1887	44,759,314
Total	194,068,514

Or an average of 48,517,128 sheep for each year.

This shows an average of 6,648,173 more sheep in each of the four years succeeding the change than there were in each of the four years preceding the change. If the change in the tariff in 1883 had any effect in this respect it was to increase the number of sheep in the country. Gentlemen on the other side are in the habit of pointing to the number of sheep in 1883 and in 1887, and assuming that these two items determine the whole question.

And in this connection I desire to call attention to the resolution adopted in this city in January, 1888, at the conference of wool-growers, wool-dealers, and wool-manufacturers. Those resolutionswere addressed to Congress as a remonstrance on the part of the representatives of the National Association of Wool Manufacturers and of the Wool Growers' National Association against the passage of the Mills bill, and assumed to furnish Congress information upon the condition of wool-growing and wool-manufacturing in the United States.

I quote from the Bulletin of the National Association of Wool Manufacturers, dated Boston, 1887, one of the resolutions adopted, which is found on page 336 of that bulletin, as follows:

> The fact that the reduction in the tariff on wool in 1883 was immediately followed by a decrease in the number of sheep in the country from 50,626,626 in 1884, to 44,759,314 in 1887, gives warning that the abolition of duties on wool would seriously cripple the raising of sheep in this country, which is the third producer in quantity among the nations, and would thus increase the price of wool all over the world, while the consequent destruction of sheep would materially affect the supply and the price of meat, and, to a considerable degree, of all provisions.

A person reading this resolution would naturally infer that there had been a great destruction of sheep in the United States since the reduction of the tariff on wool by the act of March 3, 1883. These honorable gentlemen, assuming to furnish the representatives of the people with valuable information upon interests represented by themselves, assume that the condition of wool-growing in the United States after the passage of the act of 1883 gives warning that the abolition of duties on wool would seriously cripple the raising of sheep in this country. They assume with a positiveness which amounts to assertion that there was a great falling off of sheep in this country after the passage of that act, while, as I have shown, there were in the United States on an average for each of the four years which have elapsed since 1883, 6,000,000 sheep more than there were on an average for the four years preceding the change. What confidence can we place hereafter in the representations of interested parties on this subject?

There are fluctuations in all business. Sheep-raising is no exception to the rule But general conditions can only be reached by taking the average for several years. The average of four years preceding and succeeding shows a large increase in the number of sheep after the tariff reduction on wool in 1883.

Now, in the second place, as to prices of wool. There was a decrease in the average price of fine wool of about 10 cents a pound during the four years succeeding the change as compared with the four years preceding the change. There was a corresponding decrease as to other classes of wools. The average price of fine wools in January for the years 1879, 1880, 1881, and 1882 was 46.25 cents per pound. For the succeeding four years, 1884 to 1887, the average was only 35.50. But there had been a gradual decline in the average price of wool from 1867, when the high protective tariff on wool was passed, until the present time. In 1867 the price was 68 cents a pound.

In 1869 it was 50 cents, in 1873 it was 70 cents, and then it dropped each year thereafter to 58, 55, 48, 46, 44, and to 34 in 1879, or about the same price it now commands. What caused the decline in 1879 to 34 cents a pound while the tariff was unchanged? What caused the decline from 70 to 34 cents a pound on wool during the highest tariff era ever known in this country? Gentlemen must find other causes for these changes than the raising or the lowering of the tariff on wool. I concede that such changes of the tariff do affect prices remotely, but not directly. Prices of all commodities are controlled by the inexorable law of supply and demand. There was a greater supply of wool in this country during the four years succeeding the change in the tariff in 1883 than during the four years preceeding the change. The statistics prove this. But the average number of sheep each year was 6,648,000 greater. If each produced a fleece of 6 pounds, the wool supply would, from the home clip only, exceed by 40,000,000 pounds each year that of the preceeding four years.

This would materially depress prices, unless there was a corresponding increase in demand. We have no statistics since 1880 that would accurately determine this fact. The probabilities are, however, that there has been in recent years a large overproduction of woolen goods in this country. As such goods are loaded down with the taxes on the raw material, they can not be shipped abroad and sold in competition with goods manufactured out of untaxed raw material. Hence they must overcrowd our home market, and thus depress not only the prices of woolen goods, but also of wool itself. Overproduction is the inevitable consequence of high tariffs. In many branches of business combinations or trusts have been formed for the purpose of limiting production and controlling the prices of their products. Thus high tariffs produce overproduction and overproduction produces the combine and the trust.

I do not charge that there has been a trust formed by those engaged in woolen interests. But it is conceded that the high tariff on wool has restricted our wool-growers to the home market; they can not ship their wool, under present conditions, to other countries. A restricted market places their products at the mercy of the manufacturers of woolen goods in this country. When they overstock the market, they must shut down their mills or work them on limited time and with less force. This diminishes the demand for wool, and a fall in prices is the inevitable result.

NOT AN INFANT INDUSTRY.

On yesterday we heard the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN] speak of the potter's art as one of the oldest industries known to man, but the raising of sheep is of even greater antiquity.

The stereotyped pretext of protecting an infant industry can not be set up in defense of taxing either wool or pottery. The very earliest industry known to man was that of raising sheep. Abel, the second son of Adam, was "a keeper of sheep." [Laughter.] The offering of the firstlings of his flock as a sacrifice to the Lord proved more acceptable than did the offering of his brother, and the murderous jealousy ensued, which caused Abel's death. In Exodus (22, 1) the penalty for stealing sheep was the restoration to the owner of four sheep for each one stolen. In Deuteronomy (22, 1) is found the injunction "not to see thy brother's sheep go astray." The law required every shepherd to look after the welfare of his neighbor's flock as well as his own, and not to permit his sheep to go astray. On the occasion of great assemblies of people sheep were slaughtered for their food. We are told in I Chronicles (5, 21) that the sons of Reuben took from the Hagarites in war 250,000 sheep. This was 1,300 years B. C., and indicates that there was a large sheep-growing industry more than three thousand years ago.

Mr. MCCREARY. Did they have free wool in those days? [Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes; they had free wool in those days.

The Scriptures are filled with references to sheep. Abel and David were shepherds. The Savior of the World is called the Good Shepherd, and his birth was first announced "to the shepherds who watched their flocks by night" on the plains of Judea. What excuse can there be for placing the business of raising sheep and growing wool in the category of infant industries? What nonsense to assert that this industry can not exist in the United States of America, where the soil and climate are unsurpassed, unless Congress imposes a high tariff on wool! What folly to load down with taxes that article of all others which most contributes to the health and comfort of mankind!

A CONDITION CONFRONTS US.

At the beginning of this session of Congress we were confronted with a condition of affairs which demanded a revision of the tariff and a reduction of the surplus revenue in the Treasury. The President, in his annual message to Congress in December last, called attention to this condition, and recommended the immediate passage of a bill to correct the inequalities of the tariff and reduce the surplus, characterizing our tariff laws as "the vicious, inequitable, and illogical source of unnecessary taxation." At that time the excess of revenue for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, amounted to $55,000,000, and the estimated surplus at the end of the fiscal year was placed at $140,000,000. According to the statement made by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] in the House on July 3, last, the surplus at the close of the last fiscal year (June 30, 1887), was $129,272,205.90, notwithstanding a purchase of bonds during the year up to that time to the amount of $32,386,800.

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE ON FREE WOOL.

In view of these facts the President was justified in departing from the usual custom of sending in a message on the leading topics of home and foreign affairs and devoting the whole paper to the subject of the surplus and suggesting the proper means for its reduction. He urged the reduction of tariff taxes and a revision of the customs laws as essential to the removal of unnecessary burdens on the people and in order to promote the general welfare. Among other subjects referred to by him was the tariff on wool, and he urged the reduction or removal of this duty in any revision of the tariff laws that might be made. This part of his message is clear, forcible, and convincing, and deserves the careful consideration of every person in the United States, and especially of the voters who are to pass upon this question at the polls in November next.

The following are the portions of the message on this subject:

The farmer and the agriculturist, who manufacture nothing, but who pay the increased price which the tariff imposes, upon every agricultural implement, upon all he wears and upon all he uses and owns, except the increase of his flocks and herds and such things as his husbandry produces from the soil, is invited to aid in maintaining the present situation; and he is told that a high duty on imported wool is necessary for the benefit of those who have sheep to shear, in order that the price of their wool may be increased. They of course are not reminded that the farmer who has no sheep is by this means obliged, in his purchases of clothing and woolen goods, to pay a tribute to his fellow farmer as well as to the manufacturer and merchant; nor is any mention made of the fact that the sheep-owners themselves and their households must wear clothing and use other articles manufactured from the wool they sell at tariff prices, and thus as consumers must return their share of this increased price to the tradesman.

I think it may be fairly assumed that a large proportion of the sheep owned by the farmers throughout the country are found in small flocks numbering from twenty-five to fifty. The duty on the grade of imported wool which these sheep yield is 10 cents each pound if of the value of 30 cents or less, and 12 cents if of the value of more than 30 cents. If the liberal estimate of 6 pounds be allowed for each fleece, the duty thereon would be 60 or 72 cents, and this may be taken as the utmost enhancement of its price to the farmer by reason of this duty. Eighteen dollars would thus represent the increased price of the wool from twenty-five sheep and $36 that from the wool of fifty sheep; and at present values this addition would amount to about one-third of its price. If upon its sale the farmer receives this or a less tariff profit, the wool leaves his hands charged with precisely that sum, which in all its changes will adhere to it, until it reaches the consumer.

When manufactured into cloth and other goods and material for use, its cost is not only increased to the extent of the farmer's tariff profit, but a further sum has been added for the benefit of the manufacturer under the operation of other tariff laws. In the mean time the day arrives when the farmer finds it necessary to purchase woolen goods and material to clothe himself and family for the winter. When he faces the tradesman for that purpose he discovers that he is obliged not only to return in the way of increased prices, his tariff profit on the wool he sold, and which then perhaps lies before him in manufactured form, but that he must add a considerable sum thereto to meet a further increase in cost caused by a tariff duty on the manufacture. Thus in the end he is aroused to the fact that he has paid upon a moderate purchase, as a result of the tariff scheme, which, when he sold his wool seemed so profitable, an increase in price more than sufficient to sweep away all the tariff profit he received upon the wool he produced and sold.

When the number of farmers engaged in wool-raising is compared with all the farmers in the country, and the small proportion they bear to our population is considered; when it is made apparent that, in the case of a large part of those who own sheep, the benefit of the present tariff on wool is illusory; and, above all, when it must be conceded that the increase of the cost of living caused by such tariff becomes a burden upon those with moderate means and the poor, the employed and unemployed, the sick and well, and the young and old, and that it constitutes a tax which, with relentless grasp, is fastened upon the clothing of every man, woman, and child in the land, reasons are suggested why the removal or reduction of this duty should be included in a revision of our tariff laws.

CONSUMPTION OF WOOL AND WOOLEN GOODS.

The manufactures of wool enter into universal consumption. No other element enters so largely into domestic affairs as does wool. From the cradle to the grave it is around and about us. In the Northern portions of our country human existence would be intolerable and vast areas would be comparatively depopulated if woolen goods were eliminated from our domestic economy. The health, comfort, and prosperity of the people largely depend upon a liberal supply of the productions of wool, or those of which wool is the chief component.

The production of wool in the United States for the year 1886 was 285,000,000 pounds. The imports of wool for that year were 129,084,950. It is estimated that the woolen goods which were imported into the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, contained raw wool to the amount of 196,000,000 pounds. This would show that the amount of raw wool consumed in the United States for the year 1886–'87 amounted to 610,084,958 pounds. Assuming that the population of the United States at this time is 60,000,000, this would show that the consumption of raw wool per capita for the past year was 10 pounds, or for a family of five persons 50 pounds of wool was consumed. The average price of raw wool at this time is 34 cents a pound, and the 50 pounds consumed by each family would therefore amount to $17, which would represent the cost to each family of five persons in the United States of raw wool for the past year. If we multiply the whole number of pounds of raw wool consumed by the price of wool at this time, it will show that there were $207,428,885 worth of raw wool and wool in manufactured woolen products consumed in the United States in the year 1886–'87.

The value of manufactures of woolen goods consumed in the United States in 1880 is estimated as follows: The domestic production of woolen fabrics, according to the census of 1880, was valued at $267,252,913. There were imported during the year 1880 woolen goods to the amount of $35,013,255. The duties paid upon the imported goods amounted to $21,152,070. The manufactures of men's and women's clothing in the United States for the census year 1880, less the cost of materials used therein, were valued at $90,630,745. I deduct the materials used in the manufacture of clothing for the reason that they were composed of the domestic productions and importations already estimated. The aggregate of these amounts would represent the total value of woolen goods consumed in the United States in 1880 in the hands of the manufacturers, or at the port of entry, plus the duty upon the imported goods. It is well known, however, that the cost of bringing these goods to the consumers of the country will add at least 25 per cent. to their value in the hands of the importers and manufacturers. The 25 per cent. thus added would amount to $103,512,245, making a grand aggregate of cost for that year of woolen goods to the people of the United States of $517,561,228.

There were in the United States in 1880, in round numbers, fifty millions of people, and if we divide the aggregate of woolen goods consumed by the whole number of the population it will show that the cost for woolen goods to each person was $10, or for a family of five persons, $50.

There is an element in this cost which is attributable to the tariff on wool and woolen goods. It will be interesting to determine how far the aggregate of cost of woolen goods was increased on that account.

I do not claim that the whole amount of the duty paid on foreign importations is in all cases added to the cost to the consumers of like products produced in this country; but where the home product does not exceed the home demand for consumption and foreign productions must come in to supply the deficiency, the cost of the home product is fixed by the cost of the foreign product plus the duty. In the case of woolen goods, the supply did not equal the demand, as it appears that $25,000,000 worth of woolen goods were imported into the United States in 1880, upon which duties were actually paid to the amount of $21,000,000.

TARIFF INCREASES COST OF WOOLEN GOODS.

It is safe to estimate that the woolen goods manufactured in this country were enhanced in value on account of the tariff on imported goods of like quality to the extent of at least 40 per cent., or on this account to the amount of $106,873,165. There were actually paid in duties on imported woolen goods for that year $21,152,070. This amount was necessarily added to the cost of the imported articles. This would make a total increase of the cost of the domestic product of woolen goods in the hands of the manufacturers and importers to the amount of $128,025,235. If we add to this amount 25 per cent. as commissions and expenses necessarily incurred before the goods reach the consumers, making $32,006,308, we will find that the total cost to consumers in the United States in 1880 on account of the tariff on woolen goods amounted to $160,031,543. At that time, as stated before, there were 50,000,000 inhabitants in the United States, and the cost of protection to wool and woolen goods would therefore amount to $3.20 per capita, or to a family of five persons, $16.

If each Congressional district contained at that time 150,000 inhabitants, which is about the ratio, the woolen goods consumed in each district would have cost the consumers in 1880, $1,500,000. The tariff burden per capita, as before stated, for that year was estimated at $3.20. The amount of tariff burden, therefore, to each district would be $480,000.

These estimates are based on the statistics of 1880 for the reason that we have no statistics since that time of the amount and value of domestic manufactures of woolen goods. It is safe to say that there has been an increase in domestic manufactures of woolen goods since that time equal to the increase of population, and perhaps greater, as our wants are continually expanding. The ratio of tariff burdens on woolen goods consumed has at least been preserved since 1880, and in all probability increased. It is therefore safe to estimate that there has been an increase in each item of at least 10 per cent.

The account in 1880 would then stand as follows: The whole amount of woolen goods consumed in 1880 was $517,561,228. Ten per cent. of this amount would be $51,756,122. Our total cost in 1880 of woolen goods consumed was $569,316,350. The tariff burden in 1880, as before stated, was $160,031,543. If we add 10 per cent. to this, namely, $16,003,154, we will have a total of tariff burdens in the United States in 1888 amounting to $176,034,697. The tariff burden in each Congressional district in 1880 was estimated at $480,000. If we add 10 per cent. to this, namely, $48,000, we would have a tariff burden to each Congressional district of $528,000 on account of the tariff on wool and woolen goods.

WHAT PROTECTION TO WOOL-GROWERS COSTS.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] said on Thursday last (see CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 6757):

Nothing can be clearer than that if wool is admitted free of duty it will result in a decline of wool nearly to the extent of the duty.

This means that the domestic product of wool is increased in value or price to the purchaser to an amount equal to the duty on the imported article. This will be true as long as the duty remains.

The average rate of duty on imported unwashed wool for 1887 was 35.10 per cent. ad valorem, or about 10 cents a pound.

The production of wool for 1886 was 285,000,000 pounds.

If the wool-growers in 1886 realized an increased price on their wool to the amount of 10 cents a pound the gain would amount to $28,500,000. They do not, however, realize the full amount of 10 cents a pound.

But for the sake of argument let us concede a loss the first year to the wool-growers of $28,500,000 on their wool product in case of a repeal of the duties on wool.

This would be a loss to the wool-growers of each Congressional district, assuming (which is only approximately the fact) that the wool-growers were equally distributed to each district, of the whole sum divided by the number of districts, including Delegates, or only $85,585.

It appears also that in order to afford the wool-growers a protection on their wool product of 1886 of only $28,500,000 the consumers of wool in the United States were subjected to a tax equal to $176,034,697.

This tariff burden on account of the protection to wool-growers amounted in each Congressional district to $528,000, while the average amount of protection realized to each district was only $85,585, a net loss to each district of $442,415. Assuming that the wool-growers receive all the protection which is claimed, we submit that such protection is an expensive luxury to the consumers of woolen goods in this country.

It is not true, as stated by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY], that "to admit wool free of duty would result in a decline in wool nearly to the extent of the duty." It is true that during the continuance of the protective duty the price may be advanced after the business of the country has become adjusted to the duty, to the extent of the tax, or nearly so.

But if we abolish the duty, and place wool on the free-list, there will be a variety of conditions or circumstances which would result therefrom, which would all tend to increase again the price of wool, and that, too, within a very short period of time.

TARIFF ACT OF 1867 AND ITS RESULTS.

In 1867 the wool-growers of the country and the manufacturers of woolen goods succeeded in inducing Congress to impose protective duties on the importation of foreign wools, and also to impose such additional duties upon importations of foreign woolen goods as would compensate them for the loss they would sustain by reason of the duties on the raw material. The tariff upon wool prior to 1867 had been fluctuating under various acts of Congress from 1824 to 1865. Some of these acts place the duties very low. From 1858 to 1861 wool costing 20 cents per pound or less was on the free-list, and all other wools paid a duty of 24 per cent. ad valorem. From 1862 to 1864 the duty on wools costing 18 cents per pound and less was but 5 per cent. ad valorem; and over 18 cents and less than 24 cents it was 3 cents per pound; and over 24 cents per pound in price, 9 cents per pound in duty.

Between 1865 and 1866 the tariff on wool costing 12 cents per pound and less was 3 cents per pound, and costing over 12 cents up to 24 cents per pound the duty was 6 cents per pound, and between 24 cents per pound and 32 cents per pound the duty was 10 cents per pound and 10 per cent. ad valorem; and all wools costing over 32 cents per pound the duty was 12 cents per pound and 10 per cent. ad valorem. The act of August 22, 1866, slightly changed these duties, but they remained substantially the same until the taking effect of the act of March 2, 1867.

The duties were very unequally distributed by the act of 1867 on the different classes of wool, carpet wools being taxed at the rate of from 18 to 39 per cent. ad valorem, while fine wool pays from 37 to 88 per cent. in the grease, and from 31 to 96 per cent. if washed, and from 73 to 110 per cent. if in scoured condition. It will be seen that the high tariff upon fine washed and scoured wools has had a marked effect upon the manufacture of woolen goods in this country, and has worked greatly to the injury of both the wool growers and manufacturers, as will be seen as I proceed further.

The wool-growers felicitated themselves after the passage of the act of 1867 upon the success which had attended their efforts in securing a protective tariff on their product; but we will see how far their expectations have been realized. Their object in securing tariff legislation was to prevent foreign wools from competing with their products. They desired to practically exclude many classes of wool from our markets in order that they might receive greater prices for all they might raise. I shall be able to prove that, so far from realizing their expectations, the market was actually depressed; that in the States east of the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers the number of sheep vastly decreased, and that the price of wool averaged less per pound after the high tariffs were imposed than prevailed previously under low tariffs.

HOW TARIFFS AFFECT PRICE OF WOOL.

The American wool-growers are not the only persons who have been disappointed in this respect, and our Government is not the only government that has imposed protective duties on wool at the instance of wool-growers to realize later that the object had in view was not only not accomplished but the opposite of public expectation occurred. The history of protective tariffs on wool in this country and in France and England shows how wrong in theory is the idea that tariffs of themselves control prices. Tariffs may contribute to raise or to lower, as other circumstances may contribute to produce results, but they are not the sole cause of high prices or low prices. It has frequently happened in the history of our country, and in the history of other countries, that protectionists have secured high tariffs on particular articles only to realize low prices at home for articles intended to be protected; while, on the other hand, free-traders hoping to secure low prices by taking off duties have been disappointed to find the prices higher after than before. I have the authority of Mr. Bastiat (Sophisms of Protection, page 211) for the following information in reference to protective tariffs on wool in France and in England:

For instance—

Says Mr. Bastiat—

In France, to protect the farmer, a law was passed imposing a duty of 22 per cent. upon imported wools, and the result has been that native wools have sold for much lower prices than before the passage of the law. In England a law in behalf of the consumers was passed exempting foreign wools from duty, and the consequence has been that native wools have sold higher than ever before.

History has repeated itself in the United States on this subject; and this leads us to consider how prices are affected by tariffs. The reason a protective tariff may result in diminishing the price of the home product is from the fact that while the supply may have diminished by cutting off the foreign importation of the raw material the embarrassment to manufacturers resulting from this may have caused a diminished demand; and if the demand should diminish in greater proportion than the supply should diminish the price would fall instead of increase. On this subject I may be permitted to quote again from Mr. Bastiat. He says:

1. Prices rise either on account of augmented demand or diminished supply.
2. They fall by reason of an augmentation of the supply or diminution of the demand.

There are two kinds of dearness and two kinds of cheapness. There is a bad dearness, which results from diminution of supply, for it implies scarcity and privation. There is a good dearness, that which results from an increase of demand, for this indicates the augmentation of general wealth.

There is also a good cheapness, resulting from abundance, and there is a baleful cheapness, such as results from the cessation of demand or the inability of consumers to purchase.—Sophisms, page 214.

Applying these general principles to the facts in relation to the wool interest of the United States, the complications concerning the subject will be easily understood.

The average price of medium American washed clothing fleece wool in New York for the fifteen years preceding 1867, the date of the passage of the act of that year, placing high protective duties on wool, was 52.8 cents per pound. The average price for the fifteen years succeeding the passage of that act was 48.6 cents per pound. This shows that there was a depreciation in prices for fifteen years after the passage of the high tariff duties on wool equal to 4.2 cents per pound.

The whole amount of wool produced from 1867 to 1881 was 2,796,750,000 pounds, upon every pound of which the American wool-growers have averaged a loss of 4.2 cents. The average production for each of the fifteen years would amount to 186,450,000 pounds, and the average annual loss amounted to $7,830,900, while the grand aggregate of fifteen years' loss amounted to $117,463,500.

I refer in this connection to the pamphlet recently published by Dr. E. P. Miller, an eminent writer on economic questions, of the protection school, entitled "Facts About Wool and Woolens," page 10. His testimony on this subject is important, and is as follows:

A significant fact in connection with this subject is this: In 1833 wool under 8 cents a pound was admitted free of duty; the price of fine wool in January of that year was 55 cents a pound, while in January, 1834, it was 70 cents, a rise of 15 cents per pound; the price of coarse wool in January, 1833, was 33 cents a pound; in April it was 38 cents; in July, 40; in October, 45; and in January, 1834, it was 48 cents a pound, showing an advance of 15 cents a pound in one year after putting wool on the free-list. Again, in 1857, when wool valued at 20 cents a pound or less was put upon the free-list, although it fell off a little in 1858, it was 2 cents a pound higher in January, 1859, than in January, 1857.

In 1824, after thirty-five years of free wool, the price of fine wool in January was 68 cents, and in April 70 cents a pound. In May of that year a tariff of 15 and 20 per cent. was placed on wool, but the price instead of going up went down, for fine wool sold in July at 55 cents; in October at 60 cents; in January, 1826, at 55 cents; and in January, 1827, at 36 cents. Again, in 1842, after ten years of nearly free wool, a tariff was placed on low-priced wool, and in January of that year fine wool was sold at 48 cents and coarse at 35 cents; in January, 1843, fine at 35 cents and coarse at 25 cents per pound. After the increase of tariff in 1861, wool, like all other articles, went up in price, owing to general inflation of prices resulting from the large volume of paper money circulated during the war.

After the tariff act of March, 1867, the highest in the history of the country, the price of wool declined instead of advancing, for it sold in January, 1866, at 70 cents; in January, 1867, at 68 cents; in April, at 60; in July, at 55; in October, at 48; and in January, 1868, at 48 cents a pound; in April, at 50; in July, at 46; and in October, at 48—a decline in one year of 20 cents a pound.

There was not only a great fall in the price of wool after the passage of the act of 1867, but there was an immense reduction in the number of sheep in the country.

DISASTROUS RESULTS.

There were other striking results which followed the high protective tariff of 1867. I asked the Bureau of Statistics to furnish some figures on this subject showing the number of sheep in the States east of the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers for 1860 to 1888, that being the portion of the country which was principally interested in procuring the high protective tariff on wool. From this table, which I will print in connection with my remarks, it appears that in 1860, after the period of free trade in wool which preceded that time, there were in the States east of the Mississippi and the Missouri 19,221,714 sheep, while in 1888 in the same States there were only 18,696,719, showing a falling off of over a half million sheep in the States east of the Missouri River since 1860.

But that is not all. Between 1860 and 1867, when the tariff duties were very low and scarcely affected the production or the price of wool at all, there was an increase of from 19,000,000 to 38,991,912 sheep in all the United States, and in the States east of Mississippi and Missouri there was an increase to 37,864,609. That was the number in this country when the wool-growers formed a combination with the woolen manufacturers and secured a high protective tariff on wool. Immediately after the passage of the act of 1867 there began a decline in the wool interests in all of the States which had invoked that change, from the Missouri River east to the Atlantic Ocean.

The fall was so great that at this time (1888) in the same States east of the Missouri River we have only 18,000,000 of sheep, whereas in 1867 there were 37,000,000. In other words, we have now less than one-half as many sheep in this portion of the country as we had at that time. It will be interesting for gentlemen upon this floor to compare the figures in this table showing the number of sheep in their own States at different periods and to see what a besom of destruction was visited upon the flocks east of the Mississippi and the Missouri after the tariff of 1867 was passed. I desire especially to call the attention of the Republican Representatives from the State of Ohio, a State that has a large sheep-growing interest, and one which contributed, perhaps, more than any other to secure the tariff legislation of 1867 for the protection of wool-growers.

In that State in 1867 there were 6,730,126 sheep. In 1875 the number had decreased to 4,592,600; in 1878 to 3,783,000, a loss in ten years of nearly one-half the sheep of the State. There has been a gradual increase from 1878 to the present time, 1888, when the number in the State is put down at 4,106,622, which shows that there are now in Ohio 2,623,504 sheep less than there were twenty-one years ago, when a protective tariff was invoked by the sheep-growers of that State to protect their industry. I hope the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCKINLEY] and his colleagues will be able to explain to their constituents during the ensuing vacation how it is that the protective tariff has reduced the number of sheep in Ohio in twenty-one years nearly 33 per cent., when by natural causes there should have been at least an increase to that extent. I will also ask the gentlemen who represent the State of Pennsylvania on this floor, and who are so clamorous for protection for wool-growers, to consider the effects of the tariff of 1867 upon the sheep industry of Pennsylvania. In 1867 there were in that State 3,422,002. There are in that State to-day the beggarly amount of 984,891, being a loss in that State in twenty-one years of 2,437,311, a loss exceeding two-thirds of the entire number in the State.

The eloquent gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] has raised his voice on this floor on many occasions in behalf of a high protective tariff on wool, presumably in the interest of the wool-growers of Michigan. Let us see how that State has flourished under the protective régime. There were in Michigan, in 1867, 3,948,191 sheep, while in 1888 there are only 2,113,004, a loss in that State, in twenty-one years, of 1,824,987, nearly half of the entire number in the State. If this protective system can remain in force another twenty-one years, the entire number will be wiped out of the States, with the same ratio of decrease.

I perhaps ought to refer to the State which I have the honor in part to represent, Illinois. That State is represented on this floor by fourteen Republicans, all of whom are opposed to putting wool on the free-list, presumably in the interest of the wool-growers of our great State. Let us see how Illinois has fared during the era of high protection on wool-growing. In 1867 there were in that State 2,736,431 sheep, while in the year 1888 the number is put down at 814,177, showing a loss of 1,922,254.

Neither ought I to neglect the State of Maine in this connection, although the number of sheep raised in that State is scarcely worth mentioning. In 1867 the number of sheep in that State was 752,542; the number in 1888 is 547,725, showing a loss in this State of 204,817 sheep; not great in numbers, but being a proportionate reduction of nearly one-third, thus showing that the general average of reduction is preserved along the whole line. I have already referred to the fact that during this same period the price of wool has fallen from 68 cents a pound in 1867 to 34 cents a pound in 1888, a fall of just one-half in the number of sheep east of the Missouri and Mississippi Rivers and just one-half in the price of the wool which they bear. I will print in this connection a statement, taken from the special Treasury report, 1887, on Wool and Wool Manufactures, page 109, showing the price of wool in New York from 1860 to 1887. (See appendix.)

I commend these facts to the careful consideration of the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber. They will have plenty of time between this and the reassembling of Congress in December to explain to their constituents how it happened that after the Republican party, at the instance of the wool-growers, placed a high protective tariff on wool in 1867, that immediately in the States interested in that protection the number of sheep feel off, the price came down, and now, after twenty-one years of sad experience, they have reduced the number and the price one-half. So much for the benefits of protection to the wool-growers of the country.

It will be seen from these statistics that after twenty-one years of protective tariffs on wool the number of sheep in the States intended to be benefited have fallen off one-half, notwithstanding the fact that the population of the country during that time increased over 30 per cent. and railroads penetrated all the Western States and Territories and immense agricultural interests grew up everywhere. Contrast these facts with the sheep interests in Great Britian. The whole number of sheep in Great Britian in 1866 was 25,795,000, in 1874 it was 35,000,000, an increase in eight years of 35 per cent. under absolute free trade in wool, and with an area no greater than some of our larger States.

I desire to explain as clearly as I am able to do the remarkable results following the passage of the protective tariff on wool in 1867. I know that protectionists are slow to believe facts so unwelcome to them as those which I have presented, but facts are facts and must be accepted as true. These facts are consistent with all other facts which have taken place since the passage of the act of 1867. I have stated that prices are sometimes affected by other causes than by the imposition of customs duties to protect the home product; but in the case of the tariff on wool passed in 1867, which instead of increasing the price of the home product diminished it, the explanation is found in connection with other facts to which I will call attention.

As I said before, prices may be enhanced by diminishing the supply, or prices may be reduced by limiting the demand; in other words, prices are controlled by the inexorable law of demand and supply.

The immediate effect of the passage of the act of 1867, placing high tariffs on wool, was to encourage sheep-raising, and the productions of wool in the United States increased from 168,000,000 pounds in 1867 to 180,000,000 pounds in 1868, being an increase of 12,000,000 pounds. This overproduction of wool immediately depressed prices of wool, and reacted on wool-growing. The number of sheep fell off rapidly, as already explained, especially in the States east of the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers. The production of wool began to fall off, and in 1871 the product was only 150,000,000 pounds. But the disaster to wool-growing was taken advantage of by the importers, and the imports of wool increased from 25,000,000 pounds in 1868 to 126,507,000 pounds in 1872.

But the prices of wool have never reached on an average the prices which prevailed in 1867, when the high tariff on wool was first imposed. The price of fine wool in January, 1867, was 68 cents a pound in New York; of medium, 53 cents, and of coarse, 50 cents. In January, 1883, the prices of the same grades were 40, 43, and 33, and in January, 1887, they were 33, 38, and 33.

Reference is made to a statement which will be found of interest in this connection, and which I will print in the Appendix, showing the quantities of wool produced, imported, exported, and retained for consumption in the United States, from 1839 to 1886, inclusive.

Neither the wool-growers nor the wool-manufacturers were benefited by the high-tariff act of 1867.

THE ACTS OF 1867 AND 1883 COMPARED.

It is claimed and has been frequently asserted since this debate began that the slight reduction of the wool duties by the act of 1883 produced disastrous results to the wool-growers of the country. The reduction was very slight, only about 10 per cent. ad valorem. The ad valorem duty was dropped and the specific duty of 10 and 12 cents a pound was retained. The greatest reduction was on the high-priced wool, as will be seen by the following tables:

The average rate of duties imposed on unwashed wool by the act of 1883 was, on the importations of 1887, equivalent to 35.10 per cent. ad valorem, surely a sufficient protection to prevent disastrous or even injurious competition. This duty is on the unwashed product. If washed the duties are doubled, and if scoured the duties are trebled. This assumes that unwashed wools have only 33 per cent. of pure wool—the rest is dirt and grease. The dirt and grease constitute no part of the wool, and the duty is therefore the treble duty on scoured wool, namely, under the present law, on first and second class wools, 30 and 36 cents a pound, and on the carpet wools, or third class, 7½ cents and 15 cents a pound. The average duty on the scoured wools of the first and second classes was, on the basis of the importations of 1887, 67 per cent. reduced to an ad valorem basis.

It will be seen by reference to the Treasury report of imports anp exports for 1887 that the amount of scoured wool imported was valued at only about $78,000, and the washed wools at only about $131,000, while the total value of wools imported during that year (1887) was $18,206,987.

DIRT AND GREASE.

There is a great outrage concealed in this classification of wools under the tariff laws.

I call attention of members to the definitions of "washed" and "scoured" wools, and to the percentages of scoured wool, as given in the special report of the Treasury Department (1887) on "wool and manufactures of wool," pages XXV and XXVI:

Washed wool.—Washed wool is wool washed on the back of the animal by a bath or by spout-washing, or washed upon the pelt or hide of the slaughtered animal.

Scoured wool.—All wools that are washed after they are shorn or pulled from the pelt or hide of the animal are called scoured wools. This term is generally applied where the use of warm or hot water is made.

Percentage of scoured wool.—Unwashed merino wool shrinks from 50 to 80 per cent. in scouring. The lightest and choicest Australian medium, unwashed, will yield 50 per cent. less of scoured wool, and the heaviest mestiza buck's fleeces will yield about 2/ per cent. of pure scoured wool. Most unwashed wools yield less than 50 per cent. of scoured wool. The light, open, coarse, unwashed wools of the carpet class yield from 50 to 70 per cent. of scoured wool. Fine Ohio full-blood merino unwashed wool, exclusive of buck's fleeces, yields from 35 to 40 per cent. of scoured wool. The merino fleeces grown in Texas and on the Western prairies of the United States yield from 25 to 30 per cent. of scoured wool. Unmerchantable Ohio fleeces yield from 37 to 40 per cent. of scoured wool. British and Canada wools yield from 70 to 85 per cent. of scoured wool. Cross-bred, washed Ohio fleeces yield from 60 to 80 per cent. of scoured wool. Cross-bred Western American prairie fleeces yield from 30 to 50 per cent. of scoured wool. Tub-washed wools and cross-bred sheep generally yield from 80 to 90 per cent. of scoured wool. Scoured wools, as usually manufactured or as scoured for sale, yield from 85 to 90 per cent. of scoured wool in rewashing.

It will thus be seen that the Australian wools, such as are required in this country to mix with our native wools, will yield 50 per cent. and the British and Canadian wools from 70 to 85 per cent. of scoured wool. Hence, it pays the importer better to import wool in the grease or in its natural state than after scouring. Australian wool, if imported in the grease, would pay a duty of 10 cents a pound, if valued at less than 30 cents a pound; if valued over 30 cents a pound, 12 cents a pound. In 100 pounds of this unwashed wool there would be 50 pounds of scoured wool.

The duty on the 100 pounds would be, if imported unwashed, ten or twelve dollars. If scoured, the duty would be thirty or thirty-six dollars. Or on a package that would yield 50 pounds of pure wool, the duty would be, if imported in the grease, $10 if valued before scouring at 30 cents or less per pound, or $12 if valued at over 30 cents a pound; but if imported as pure wool the duty would be $15 or $18, according to the same classification. Hence the importer requires his customers, the producers of the imported wool, to ship it in the grease. Or in other words, the producer is required to ship and pay freight on 100 pounds of dirt and grease in order to ship 100 pounds of wool to market. Thus Congress throws a great obstacle in the way of commerce in wool by requiring a pound of dirt to be shipped with every pound of wool which may come into our country from abroad. This is precisely the same in effect as raising the freights 100 per cent. on all imported wools, without any benefit to any one except the owners of ships, whose freightage is thus increased. As imported wool is consumed by our own people, the burden thus artificially created is borne by the American consumers of woolen goods. Can legislative folly be carried to greater extent?

Suppose a law should be passed requiring the Western farmer, when he ships a bushel of wheat to England, to ship at the same time a bushel of sand, and to pay the same freights on both; would not everybody cry out against it as iniquitous in the extreme? Yet that is strictly analogous to the law now in force on the subject of importing wools. [Derisive laughter on the Republican side.] Gentlemen may laugh, but the law remains as I have stated it, and they can not deny it.

DEPRESSIONS, HARDSHIPS, AND DISASTERS.

But notwithstanding the folly of Congress and the insatiate greed of private interests, the tariff on wool has not resulted in the benefits to woolen manufacturers that they anticipated and confidently expected. Since the imposition of the high protective duties by the act of 1867 there have been many seasons of depression, hard times, and even disasters.

In 1874 a committee of the New York Wool Trade made a report to the committee of the Chamber of Commerce of New York on the revision of the tariff, in which it was stated "that our woolen interest is depressed and suffering, and that in reality it has never reached that degree of stability and security which would be commensurate with its magnitude and importance; that the amount of capital invested in it and that the indomitable energy which has so far preserved it from serious decline are facts too well known to require any proof at our hands." This report then proceeds to explain some of the difficulties which beset the wool interests of the country. It says:

Our manufacturers are prone to rush into the production of such classes of goods as a momentary demand has rendered profitable, and the invariable result is an overproduction of those fabrics. Such an overproduction sometimes happens to manufacturers in Europe, but they can relieve themselves of their surplus stock at a comparatively small sacrifice by consigning their goods to foreign markets, where their cheapness has already introduced them. Our manufacturer, having made his goods out of highly taxed wool, has no such outlet for them, and is compelled to await the slow operation of time or submit to a heavy sacrifice by forcing his surplus on the home market in competition with his similarly situated neighbors.

This argument applies with equal force to all other manufacturing interests. But I quote further from the same report:

Before we enter upon an examination of the effects of our tariff on the wool-growing interest it will be well to consider that neither our country nor any country in the world does or can produce to advantage wools of all kinds and grades. It must further be borne in mind that in order to produce the endless variety of woolen fabrics demanded by our times, with the highly improved machinery now in use, and with the active competition among all manufacturing nations, the free and unrestricted selection of the most suitable classes and grades of wool has grown to be a matter of much more importance to the manufacturer of every country than it used to be in old times. Nor will it be denied that but few of our mills can at this day be run to advantage without using to some extent wools of such working quality as can not be produced in this country, or are not produced here in sufficient quantity. The simple fact that even under our present tariff we have annually imported from fifteen to sixty million pounds of fine wool sufficiently proves these positions. The question of duty on fine wool can therefore never be a simple question of protection or no protection to the wool-grower.

The report points out wherein the tariff of 1867 failed to accomplish the object for which it was established, as follows:

These facts show most conclusively that the object ostensibly aimed at by the tariff of 1867, namely, the protection and encouragement of the wool-growers, has most signally failed. The wool-grower must be blind, indeed, if by this time he has not learned the lesson that he can not prosper as long as the woolen interest does not flourish; why should he not also understand that our industry can not permanently flourish until it is relieved of the present heavy burden of obstructive tariff legislation? By helping the manufacturer he would certainly help himself, and secure a better reward for his labor and investment than he could ever expect to derive from the illusive protection of any tariff.

The conclusion reached by this report is as follows:

Facts, indeed, as well as sound reasoning, call loudly for the abolition of all duties on wool. In the light of past experience it is clear that neither the wool-grower nor any other special interest ought to plead any injury as likely to result in our country from a policy that has had the most encouraging effect in all other parts of the civilized world. No perfectly safe and solid ground will be reached until wool takes its permanent place on the free-list, and this must be the goal of the manufacturer as well as of the wool-grower—in fact, of the whole people.

The foregoing report was published in 1874. In 1878 the leading manufacturers of woolen goods in the United States united in a petition to Congress in favor of a revision of the tariff on woolen goods, in which they requested that the duties on all wools may be largely reduced, if not wholly removed; that wools not produced in this country be put on the free-list, and that the duties on woolens may be fixed at a moderate rate, corresponding with the scale adopted in other manufactures.

They represented to Congress in their petition that for several years past their industry had "suffered great and general depression;" also that "many failures have occurred, many mills have stopped, and many others continue to run without adequate remuneration to their owners." They say:

We believe that one great cause for this widespread depression is to be found in the present high rates of duty on wool.

And again:

High cost of our fabrics has limited consumption and entirely prevented exportation, while low-cost foreign goods have forced their way into our markets through both legitimate and illegitimate channels.

After pointing out the facts that the shrinkage of values since 1867 had impaired the ability of consumers to pay the high prices contemplated by the tariff; that the number of those who can afford to purchase at a given price is lessened; that the wool-growers had not realized the advantages from the act of 1867 which they expected; that the depressed condition of woolen industry had given the wool-growers a poor market; that the production of fine wools has absolutely declined; that manufacturers of woolen goods must be left free to select their raw materials with reference to the goods they wish to make, the petitioners conclude by expressing their "deliberate conviction, after ten years' experiment, that the tariff of 1867 has not promoted the interests of the wool-manufacturers, has not promoted the interest of the wool-growers, and has been a great burden upon all the consuming classes, in return for which it has yielded no adequate revenue to the Government."

This petition is dated at Boston, January 17, 1878, and is signed by over one hundred of the leading woolen-manufacturing establishments in the United States.

What more could be said against any tariff law than the leading manufacturers of the country have said in this petition? When the manufacturers, for whose benefit the high tariffs have been enacted, learn from sad experience that their coveted protection has ceased to protect, the great mass of consumers and tax-payers may hope and confidently expect relief.

HOW TARIFF ON WOOL EMBARRASSES AMERICAN WOOL MANUFACTURERS.

Secretary Manning in 1885 sent out circular letters to our manufacturers and merchants requesting their co-operation in the improvement of our fiscal policy. The replies received were all transmitted to Congress, and were printed in Senate Executive Document No. 72, first session Forty-ninth Congress. On pages 299 to 322 of that report will be found the communication of the National Association of Wool Manufacturers. It is signed by William Whitman, Boston, president of the association, and by D. L. Einstein, New York, Thomas Dolan, Philadelphia, and Samuel R. Payson, Boston, vice presidents; Benjamin Phipps, Boston, treasurer, and by the members of the executive committee, namely, Rufus S. Frost and Joseph Sawyer, Boston; John L. Houston, Hartford; Charles F. Fairbanks, Boston; George Maxwell, Connecticut; John N. Carpenter, New Jersey; James Dobson, Philadelphia; Lewis N. Gilbert, Massachusetts, and John L. Hayes, secretary.

This statement should receive the careful consideration of every member of Congress and of the voters of the country. It is an unanswerable argument in favor of free wool. I say it is an unanswerable argument in favor of free wool, not that it advocates free wool in terms, but because it forcibly points out the evils of a high tariff tax on raw materials. I quote the following extracts:

The American manufacturer is engaged in a perpetual struggle with the manufacturers of Europe for the possession of the markets of this country. As before said, the advantages of our competitors are our obstacles. In this strife the European manufacturer possesses the advantage, which would be overwhelming if not counteracted by special legislation, of having the raw material of his manufacture free from duty—no duties on wool existing in Great Britain, France, Belgium, the Netherlands, and very slight duties, if any, in other manufacturing nations. Our European competitors are exempt from the direct enhancement, by a duty, of the cost of wool, thus requiring less capital to supply their mills, and no cost of interest on the duty required in carrying their stocks of wool and goods. They are free from the apprehension of changes in the value of wool, such as have taken place in this country in consequence of no less than seventeen changes in the tariff on wools within the memory of living manufacturers.

They are exempt from the duties on wool substitutes, so usefully employed to mix with wool in the manufacture of the cheaper and heavier cloths—duties which with us are absolutely prohibitory. They are able, from the lower cost of their raw material, to relieve themselves from overproduction by consigning their surplus stock at comparatively slight sacrifice to foreign markets, to which their cheapness has already introduced them. They are not compelled, as we are, to discriminate in their choice of wool to avoid the effect of the duty, and are able to select their wools in any condition, whether unwashed, washed, or scoured, with reference only to their desirable qualities. Through freedom of importation they have near markets—as at London, Havre, Antwerp, and Berlin—offering vast assortments and a steady supply of all kinds of wool—advantages especially favorable to the small manufacturer.

This exemption from all restrictions in the selection of raw material, together with the facilities for supply and the certainty that values will not be disturbed by legislation, is believed to be the chief cause of a characteristic of the European woolen industry, namely, that the manufacturer abroad obtains success by adhering with steady attention to the special fabrics he has undertaken to make, and in which he has acquired excellence, while diversification of manufactures, so necessary to prevent overproduction, is encouraged by the equal availability of all varieties and conditions of raw material. The effect of this policy upon the agricultural interests and the labor of the countries which adopt it we are not at present called upon to consider.

The high duty is not the only difficulty with which our manufacturers requiring foreign wools have to contend. It is held that complete protection to the most important branch of our wool-growing industry, the merino sheep hushandry, requires that washed wools in class 1 should be subject to double the duty of unwashed wool, and the duty on scoured wool should be three times the amount upon the unwashed wools—an arrangement which compels the importations of class 1 wools to be in the greasy state, necessitating the transportation charges on from two and a quarter to three pounds of grease and dirt in the wool required for a pound of cloth. The effect of the compulsion to buy greasy wool and pay a heavy specific duty on its impurities is that the American manufacturers are thereby obliged to give undue preference to light condition over fineness and the other valuable qualities of wools offering in foreign markets. Our manufacturers, moreover, are obliged by this restriction to concentrate their competition in foreign markets upon the always small proportion of the lightest unwashed wools, while our foreign competitors, having to pay duty neither upon wool nor on grease and dirt, can buy the heavy wools in the market to much better advantage.

To these considerations it should be added that the high specific duty on clothing wools—a duty irrespective of the cost—practically excludes the cheap and abundant clothing wools of South America, and by freeing them from our competition for their purchase makes them much cheaper than they would otherwise be to the manufacturers of France, Belgium, and Germany, who work them up into cloths and stuffs by the cheapest labor in Europe.

* * * * * * *

It may be said that a remedy for these difficulties is to be found in the exclusive use of the domestic wools, which will be abundantly supplied under due protection. To this we reply that neither our own country nor any other in the world does or can produce to advantage wools of all kinds and grades. Experience under high protection of wool in this country for over thirty years had demonstrated that our domestic wool-growers find it to their advantage to produce only the staple wools required for the ordinary range of woolen fabrics, and as these fabrics will always be in demand they build up their flocks—a work of time—for the production only of the fleeces which will be profitable for a long series of years.

This system, although providing admirable raw material for common goods, is incompatible with the variety required for the diversified and highly advanced manufacture which should be our aim. The American manufacturer, to compete with the fabrics of other nations in the endless variety demanded by our times, must have the power of selecting a portion of his raw material from all the world's sources of supply. The sudden and exceptional demand for more or new raw material must be supplied by importation.

The communication from which the foregoing extracts are taken has appended thereto, in addition to the signatures of the gentlemen mentioned, the following:

At the annual meeting of the National Association of Wool Manufacturers in the city of New York, on the 7th of October instant [1885], the above paper was read at length, and by a resolution of the association was unanimously approved.

Attest: JOHN L. HAYES, Secretary.

I regret that I can not quote further extracts from this communication, but these will serve to point some of the disadvantages of highly-taxed wool.

A NEW DEPARTURE.

Since the imposition of high protective duties on wool has resulted so unsatisfactorily to the interests intended to be protected, why not try a new departure, as proposed in the Mills bill, and put all wool on the free-list and reduce duties on manufactured goods to 40 per cent. ad valorem, as this bill provides?

What would be the probable effect of such a policy?

First. It would result in a large reduction in the price of woolen goods and goods into which wool enters as a component part to any extent. I have already pointed out the probable saving in dollars and cents. But there would be another advantage.

ADULTERANTS IN WOOLEN GOODS.

Our woolen goods would be of better quality. According to the statistics of the Tenth Census, 1880, the total amount of raw material consumed in the manufacture of woolen goods was as follows:

	Pounds.
Domestic wool	222,991,531
Foreign wool	73,200,698
Camel's hair	1,583,119
Mohair	159,678
Buffalo hair	671,027
Hair of other animals	5,664,142
Cotton	48,000,857
Shoddy	52,163,926
Total raw material	404,434,978

The wool used is reported as wool in the grease, and should be reduced at least 60 per cent. to obtain the amount of pure wool consumed. The legal ratio of loss is 66.66 per cent. Thus only 118,476,891 pounds of pure wool were consumed. This shows that the adulterants of woolen goods made in 1880 were as 108 parts of adulterants to 118 parts of pure wool, or that 118 pounds of pure wool were mixed with 108 pounds of hair, shoddy, cotton, etc. Any one acquainted with the internal workings of our woolen factories will recognize the truth of this statement.

And I presume that if the truth were known that ten-dollar "all-wool" suit which the honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McKINLEY] presented for the inspection of the House some time ago was composed of these adulterants in that ratio and sold out as "all wool." [Laughter.] That, however, implies no fault on the part of the gentleman who sold it, because that is the way those goods are rated in the market.

I quote from a petition of workingmen in woolen mills in Philadelphia, presented by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] and printed in the RECORD of June 30, page 6253. This petition represents the views of those who work in the Philadelphia woolen mills, and the facts therein stated can not be disputed:

It is no stretch of the truth to say that these discriminations against the manufacturing industries have very materially discouraged the use of wool and promoted the substitution of adulterants, most manufacturers having for some time given more attention to the manipulation of substitutes, so as to give them the appearance and touch of wool, than to the matter of improvements in the making of pure woolens in order to compete in quality with their foreign rivals. This has given rise to the impression that we are less skilled than the European workmen, yet it is self-evident that it requires as much if not more skill to work up the adulterants so as to give them a marketable appearance as to manipulate the genuine materials.

A great deal of stuff is put upon the markets now as cassimeres, etc., that does not contain over 10 per cent. of wool. Manufacturers who attempt to make nothing but pure woolens are compelled to close their mills. To make stuffs that shall compete in the markets with foreign makes in textures and variety it is almost invariably necessary to use some wools of foreign growth for mixing with the domestic; but as the tariff enhances the cost of these wools by from 25 to 150 per cent. there is no possibility of the American manufacturer using them in competition, and hence we are forced to give over to the foreign manufacturers the monopoly of all the markets and allow them to supply our own people with goods into which not a pound of American wool enters. Thus the woolen manufactures imported in 1887 amounted to 49,000,000 pounds, which, at 4 pounds of raw wool to the pound of finished product, represented 196,000,000 pounds of wool, which, with the 115,000,000 pounds of raw wool, makes a total importation of 311,000,000 pounds, or considerably more than the entire wool-clip of the United States. If all this had come in free in the raw state it would have absorbed for mixture a large quantity of domestic wool, instead of every pound that did come in anyhow displacing a pound of American wool and at the same time depriving American labor of employment and our poor people of the comfort of woolen clothing.

From a statement recently made public by a leading carpet manufacturer we glean the fact that ingrain carpets which formerly were made largely of wool are now made of an average of one-fifth wool and four-fifths adulterants, and in the whole of the carpet industry probably not a million pounds of domestic wool is now used. There is no carpet wool raised in this country, and yet a tax of over 26 per cent., which far exceeds all the wages paid in the manufacture of carpets, is still imposed upon the wool which is necessarily brought in from the outside. If this wool were admitted free, a greater quantity would be used, and probably not less than 10,000,000 pounds of domestic wool would be absorbed for mixture.

For these reasons we fail to see how the wool-growers are benefited by the tariff on wool, as it inevitably restricts the market for their wool both by forcing the use of substitutes and by promoting the importation of wool in the manufactured state, all of which must redound to the injury of both the wool-grower and the woolen-worker.

TAILORS AND WORKERS IN WOOLEN GOODS.

The tariff on wool and woolen goods bears with peculiar force and hardships upon American tailors, tailoresses, milliners, seamstresses, and those engaged in the manufacture of clothing. The high prices of cloths, thread, linings, and all materials used, by reason of the tariff thereon, raises their products to such a high price that the margin of compensation for the labor, both skilled and otherwise, is very small. According to the census of 1880 there were in the United States at that time 430,980 persons employed as tailors, tailoresses, seamstresses, and like industries, and in the manufacture of clothing, men's and women's, there were 186,000 employed. It appears from the census that the materials used by those employed in making clothing were valued at more than three times the amount of wages paid to employés. This poor remuneration to labor is attributable in great measure to the high price paid for the materials.

WOOL AND WHEAT.

Much has been said during this discussion about the relative prices of wheat, wool, and other farm products at various periods in the history of our country. The price of wheat in 1860 in New York was, highest, $1.70; lowest, $1.35; average, $1.52 a bushel. Six and thirty-five sixtieths bushels of wheat would buy a $10-suit of clothes at that time. The price of wheat in 1886 in New York was, highest, 95¼ cents; lowest, 83 cents; an average of 89¼ cents a bushel. Hence it would require $11\frac{1}{4}\frac{2}{5}$ bushels to buy a $10-suit of clothes in 1886, the difference in favor of 1860 being $4\frac{3}{6}\frac{7}{0}$ bushels. In other words, it required $4\frac{3}{6}\frac{7}{0}$ bushels less in 1860 to purchase a $10-suit of woolen clothes than it requires at this time, 1888. If the price of woolen goods had not been increased by the high protective tariff on wool and woolens a Western wheat-grower would probably be able to-day to purchase a $10-suit with $6\frac{3}{6}\frac{5}{0}$ bushels of wheat, as he did in 1860.

THE AVERAGE CLIP.

Much has been said during this debate about the average number of pounds of each fleece of wool. There has been in all parts of the world marked improvement in the wool product per capita. In 1840 the average weight of each fleece was only 1.85 pounds, in 1850 it was 2.42 pounds, in 1860 it was 2.68 pounds, in 1870 it was 3.52 pounds, in 1880 it was 4.79 pounds, and in 1887 it was about 6 pounds. Strange and preposterous as it may seem, gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber have claimed repeatedly that this increase was owing to the protective tariff on wool! It was all on account of the tariff!

The same gentlemen, in their zeal to sustain their pet theories, attribute all the blessings, or most of them, that we enjoy in this country to protection. Nothing is attributed to the skill of our workingmen, the perfection of our machinery, the productiveness of our soil, and the salubrity of our climate. If the protective tariff produced the large increase in the average clip in this country from 1.85 pounds in 1840 to 6 pounds in 1887, what has produced a much greater increase in the weight of the clip in Australia. In 1880 there were in that country 51,000,000 sheep, and the wool crop amounted to 392,000,000 pounds, or 8 pounds per fleece. In 1886 the number of sheep had increased to 86,254,000, and the wool crop of that year at 8 pounds per fleece would amount to 690,000,000 pounds. In Australia there is free trade in wool, and the industry, both as to the number of the sheep and the weight of the fleece, is even more prosperous than in this country. The increase in the weight of the clip is accounted for in both cases by the improvement in the science of sheep-breeding, the mixing of different breeds and varieties, and the proper care and treatment of the sheep so as to produce the best results. It is science and not subsidies that produces the change. It is proper treatment, and not protective tariff!

CALAMITIES PREDICTED.

Since this debate began we have heard the same iteration and reiteration from day to day. The burden of the argument, if it can be dignified by that name, is that if we pass the Mills bill the particular industry under discussion will be ruined. The petitions from manufacturers and other interested parties are to the same purport. Ruin, swift and complete, will follow as to every item touched by the bill. It makes no difference whether the item be put on the free-list or whether a prohibitory duty be reduced within the possibility of a slight competition, the result will be the same. Ruin to the industry is inevitable! The persons employed will be thrown out of employment, the factories or mills will be closed, and bankruptcy and financial depression will ensue. It would be invidious to quote from any one on the other side to illustrate the character of their lamentations and forebodings in case this bill should pass. In reference to wool, they all agree on the other side of the Chamber (with a few exceptions) that the placing of wool on the free-list and the reduction of the duties on manufactured woolen goods to 40 per cent. ad valorem will wreck wool-growing and wool-manufacturing in this country.

They can see nothing, after the passage of this bill, so far as the wool interests are concerned, except the slaughter of our sheep for mutton, closing of our woolen mills, and the flooding of our country with the manufactured woolen goods of free-trade England, whose manufacturers, in view of the destruction of our own sheep and mills, will charge their own prices. We will then be without the home supply and at the mercy of the enemy. Do gentlemen really believe what they say? Are they so blinded to every fact which controls the subject that they can not reach a logical conclusion? Do they ignorantly follow the teachings of interested parties, and protected classes, who are growing rich by the protective system? Perhaps there are some who seek to blind the eyes of the people for partisan purposes and advantages. But for the sake of this argument I will assume that gentlemen supporting the other side of this question are honest in their views, and that they are merely mistaken.

FREE WOOL IN OTHER COUNTRIES.

Fortunately for the friends of this bill the raising of sheep and the manufacturing of woolen goods are not left to the experience of this country. In June, 1887, the population of the United Kingdom of Great Britain was 37,000,000, about two thirds of the population of the United States. The total cultivatable area of land is only 47,874,369 acres, yet there were 29,401,750 sheep in Great Britain at that time raised and supported on land worth from $500 to $1,000 an acre. The wool imported into England in 1886 amounted to 596,470,995 pounds, and the amount exported amounted to 312,006,380 pounds; retained for home consumption 248,464,615 pounds. There were in England at that time 2,751 woolen, shoddy, and worsted factories, 6,144,594 spindles, and 282,255 persons employed in woolen manufactories. The exports from Great Britain for 1887 of woolen and worsted goods were valued at a hundred million dollars. Thus have flourished the wool and woolen industries of Great Britain under perfect free trade in wool and woolen goods. Compare this condition of the woolen interests in free-trade England with the same interests in the United States.

Here we had in 1880, the last census on the subject, 2,689 factories; 161,557 persons employed, and no exports worth mentioning of wool or woolen goods, but imports of wool in 1887 valued at $18,206,000, and of woolen goods valued at $40,000,000. The number of sheep in this country in 1887 was 44,759,314, or about three-fourths of one sheep to each inhabitant, while in England the number of sheep was 29,401,750, and the population only 37,000,000, or about four-fifths of one sheep to each inhabitant. In this country there were in 1880, according to the census, 536,081,835 acres in farms, of which 284,771,042 acres were improved, or cultivated, or about 6 acres of improved land to each sheep, and about 12 acres of farm lands to each sheep. This does not include an estimate of the ranch sheep that pasture on plains in the Western States and Territories. The cultivable area of lands in Great Britain is only 47,874,369 acres, or about one and six tenths acres to each sheep.

If free trade in wool and woolen goods in England will support a sheep on every acre and six-tenths of an acre of cultivatable land, what have we to fear in this country if wool is put on the free-list? Under a high protection on wool we have only an average of one sheep on 12 acres of farm lands, while in England, with free wool, the number of sheep has reached one for every acre and six-tenths.

TAXES HIGHEST ON CLOTHING OF THE POOR.

Gentlemen on the other side who are opposing free wool continually assert that tariffs are imposed for the benefit of the workingmen; that they are highest on luxuries and lowest on articles of general consumption. Let us examine this claim. Eighty-five per cent. of the women and children of the country, in fact all the laboring classes, wear more or less of worsted and cotton dress goods. I have obtained from a prominent merchant in New York a table showing the rate of duty on this class of goods weighing under 4 ounces to the square yard. A careful examination of this table will prove very interesting. It will be seen that the highest tax is on the lowest-priced goods. Under the old law in force prior to June 30, 1883, the duty on the cheapest qualities of these goods was 125 per cent., and this exorbitant rate was reduced to 110 per cent. by the new law. As the price increases the tax decreases step by step until the highest-priced goods, those worn by the wealthier portion of the community, are reached, where we find the tax only 60 per cent. under the old and 58 under the new law. The goods of the very poorest classes are taxed 100 per cent. more than are the goods worn by the rich. This discrimination against the poor and in favor of the rich is preserved in all the schedules imposing duties on wearing-apparel, except that there is a uniform tax of 60 per cent. on all classes of silk goods. The table to which I have referred is as follows:

Table showing the rate of duty on worsted and cotton dress goods under the old tariff and the act of March 3, 1883—goods 22 inches wide weighing under 4 ounces to the square yard.

Five per cent. for freight and charges added to the cost in Europe to make cost to land here.

Before the war the duty on these goods was 19 per cent. ad valorem.

I have another table, showing the duty on woolen dress-goods weighing under 4 ounces to the square yard. The same peculiarity is observed in this table as to the rates. The highest tax is on the cheapest goods, those worn by the poor. And not content with imposing a tax of 74½ per cent. under the old law, the protectionists in the last Congress raised this tax to 99½ per cent. But as the goods rise in price the taxes are reduced, until the fine goods of the rich come in at 43 per cent.

This table is worthy of careful examination. It has been prepared by a merchant of long experience and is based upon the actual transactions and prices at the time it was prepared (September 29, 1883). I will print it in the appendix to my remarks. It is worthy of careful consideration.

SHEEP ON THE RANCHES AND IN THE TERRITORIES.

It will be seen from the examination of the tables of statistics which I have furnished that there has been a constant increase of sheep on the ranches and in the Territories, and in the States west of the Missouri and Mississippi Rivers, while in the States east thereof there has been a falling off, since 1867, when high tariffs were enacted to protect wool-growers. The States east of those rivers procured the tariff legislation to protect them not only from foreign wools but also from the wools grown on the ranches and plains west of those rivers. The Western sheep interests were not taken into the protected circle and have received no practical benefit from the tariff. The tariff was intended to keep out the fine wools of Australia, which come in competition with the wools grown in Ohio and the States east of the Missouri River. It would vastly improve the condition of sheep husbandry in the Territories and extreme Western States if the fine wools of Australia could come in free.

This would increase largely the demand for our coarse Territorial and Western wools, to mix with the finer grades in making desirable qualities of cloth. An increased demand would cause an advance in prices, and thus the conditions would be greatly improved by admitting wool free of duty. But there would also be an increased demand for all grades of wool, as the manufacture of woolen fabrics would be greatly stimulated and increased by lowering the prices of woolen goods and bringing more of them and better qualities within the reach of consumers, who constitute the great mass of our people.

THE WORLD'S SUPPLY OF WOOL.

All calculations in reference to the production and prices of wool should take into consideration the world's supply of that article. In recent years there has been an immense development of this industry in Australasia and South America. By referring to table No. 3, which I will print in the appendix to my remarks, it will be seen that the number of sheep in Australasia in 1860 was only 20,000,000, and the number of pounds of wool exported was less than 70,000,000. The statistics for 1886 show that there were in Australasia at that time 86,352,020 sheep, and that the exports amounted to nearly 400,000,000 pounds of wool.

It will be remembered that there are in Australasia only 3,552,602 inhabitants, showing that there were nearly 25 sheep to each inhabitant. It must also be remembered that there is perfect free trade in wool in all Australasia, and that this vast industry has grown up without the stimulus of a protective tariff. The contribution of Australasia to the wool product of the world is so important that the increase of the industry in that country will be eagerly watched by business interests in all parts of the world.

I will also print a table in the appendix to my remarks showing the wool exported from the Argentine Republic during each year from 1870 to 1886. The number of sheep in that republic in 1885 was estimated at 75,000,000, as appears by a report of the Agricultural Department for January and February, 1887. There is a small tax upon importations of wool into South America, but it does not affect in any way the price of the domestic product, as there is an immense export of wool, as will be seen by a reference to the table already referred to. The number of inhabitants in the Argentine Republic in 1887 was 3,435,286, which shows 21½ sheep to each inhabitant.

The next largest sheep-growing country in the world is Russia, the number in that empire being put down in 1882 at 47,500,00. The United States comes next in order with 44,759,314 sheep in 1887. Great Britain is next in importance so far as the number of sheep is concerned, the number in the United Kingdom being put down for the year 1887 at 25,858,000. There has been a falling off in recent years in Great Britain, attributable to local causes and in no way affected by commercial restrictions as there is perfect free trade in England in reference to wool and the manufactures of wool.

FREE HIDES.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RUSSELL] has called the attention of the committee already to the fact that Congress in 1872 placed hides on the free-list, and that the leather and boot and shoe industries of the country had vastly improved since that time on that account, and that the farmers were also benefited by the greatly reduced cost of the leather and boots and shoes they must use. Mr. Switzler, the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, has furnished me at my request a table showing the vast increase in those industries (see Appendix No. 1). I call attention also to the fact that the number of pairs of boots and shoes made at the factories in 1870, namely, 80,627,244, was increased in 1880 to 125,478,511 pairs, and the number of persons employed in the factories increased from 91,702 in 1870 to 111,052 in 1880, being an increase in ten years of over 55 per cent. in the output and an increase of nearly 20 per cent. in the number of hands employed. So much for free hides.

TAXED WOOL.

Contrast the flourishing condition of the leather and boot and shoe industries, brought about through untaxed hides, with the languishing condition of the wool manufacturers of the country, as shown by the census of 1870 and 1880.

WOOLEN MANUFACTORIES, 1870 AND 1880.

Census reports show the following facts in respect to woolen manufactures in the United States for the above decades:

	1870.	1880.
Establishments	2,891	1,990
Capital invested	$98,824,531	$96,005,564
Hands	80,053	86,504
Spindles	1,845,496	1,755,740
Wages	$26,877,679	$25,893,392
Material	$96,432,601	$100,845,611
Product	$155,405,358	$160,606,721

Comment on these facts is unnecessary. The facts tell the whole story.

MR. SWITZLER'S LETTER.

Reference in this connection is made to the letter from Mr. Switzler, Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, which I will also print in the appendix to my remarks, in which it is stated on the authority of Mr. J. R. Dodge, Statistician of the Department of Agriculture, that the price of farming land in Great Britain ranges from $500 to $1,000 an acre. It is also stated that the cash rental for lands at this time in Great Britain is 30 shillings peracre, or about $7.50.

If the people of England with land worth $500 to $1,000 an acre, and renting for $7.50 an acre, can raise sheep profitably without the aid of a protective tariff, why can not the people of the United States do so, also our lands are worth from $20 to $75 an acre, and rents from $3 to $5 an acre, and we have in addition, west of the Missouri and Mississippi Rivers, immense plains and public lands upon which sheep are grazed the year round. We have also the advantage of a richer soil.

In Russia raw wool pays a customs duty of less than 2 cents a pound—a purely revenue tariff. In Germany and France wool is admitted free. There is no reason, either in the past experience of our country, or in the history and condition of wool-growing in other countries, why the United States can not raise sheep and wool with profit without the aid of protective tariffs.

ADVANTAGES TO FOLLOW.

The putting of wool on the free-list will result in a large reduction, as already stated, in the price of woolen goods. This will create a larger demand for them. A larger demand will cause an advance in prices of raw wools for manufacturing purposes. This increased demand and consequent increase in price of wool will soon restore the prices prevailing under protection without increasing the cost of woolen goods. This statement at first consideration may seem paradoxical, but it is confirmed by the truth of history in England, France, and the United States, as already shown. The reduction of the tariff on wool or its abolition has more frequently resulted in increasing the price of raw wool than in reducing it. The tax or duty being taken off of the foreign product, a greater proportion of free untaxed wool would be used. Better opportunities would be afforded the manufacturer to mix to advantage the native with the foreign wool, fewer adulterants would be used, and a cheaper and better cloth or manufactured article would be produced. With a larger percentage of cheap foreign wools, with free dye-stuffs, with mills running on full time, with quick sales, and with a steadily-increasing demand, woolen manufacturers could well afford to pay the prices they now pay for native wools and still sell their products at lower prices and realize better profits.

Putting wool on the free-list will result in innumerable blessings to the American people. It will bring increased health and comfort to every home in the land. It will bring cheap and abundant woolen clothing to our workingmen during the rigors of our Northern winters. It will cover the floors of the poor man's house with a woolen carpet. It will furnish his children with suitable apparel for the school and the church. It will cover the beds of the people with all-wool blankets in the winter time, and furnish the workingman, his wife, daughters, and sons with more solid enjoyment than any other act of legislation that can be devised. It will stimulate manufactures. It will create a demand for labor, for machinery, and for fuel. Every branch of industry will feel the healthful impetus, and new life and vigor will be infused into all trades, professions, and employments.

There will be no falling off in the production of wool in this country; no hands now employed can possibly be thrown out of employment; no wheel that now moves can possibly be checked or hindered. It will result in benefits to all, in injury to none.

Pass this bill and a new era of industrial prosperity will dawn upon us. Factories will spring up in the States of the South and West and in the Territories. Those already in existence in all parts of the country will run on full time and increase their plants from year to year. Instead of importing into this country $40,000,000 worth of woolen goods, as was done in 1887, we will soon be able to supply the home market with woolen goods and export immense quantities to other nations.

Pass this bill. Let it become the law of the land. It will result in good to all. The people will be better fed, better clothed, and will live in better houses, and sleep in better beds. In after years, when the full measure of its countless blessings shall have been realized, the generations then living and those who may come after them will rise up and invoke the blessings of Providence upon those who originated it and upon those who gave to it the force and power of law! [Great applause.]

APPENDIX.

Following are the tabular statements referred to in the foregoing speech of Mr. SPRINGER, preceded by the letter of the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics transmitting them:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF STATISTICS,
Washington, D. C., July 16, 1888.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your request of Saturday I transmit to you the following tables:

Table 1, showing the values of imported leather and manufactures of leather, and of hides and skins, other than fur skins, entered for consumption in, and of like domestic products exported from the United States during each year ending June 30, from 1870 to 1887, inclusive.

Table 2, showing the number of sheep in the United Kingdom each year from 1867 to 1887.

Accurate official records of the number of sheep in the United Kingdom were not kept prior to that date.

Table 3, showing the number of sheep and pounds of domestic wool exported from British Australasia for each year from 1860 to 1886, inclusive.

Table 4, showing the number of sheep in the States of the United States east of the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers at various periods since 1860.

I will say with respect to your inquiries in regard to the wool clip of the United Kingdom, Argentine Republic, and Australasia, that no accurate statistics showing the growth or decline of the wool clip of those countries for a series of years can be procured. The best indication of the wool clip of the Argentine Republic and Australasia is the exports, there being very little manufactured in those countries.

I am informed by Mr. J. R. Dodge, Statistician of the Department of Agriculture, that the price of farming land in Great Britain ranges from $500 to $1,000 an acre, but inasmuch as the greater portion of the land is under rental, I am unable to procure data which would afford an idea of the approximate value of the land throughout the Kingdom.

Mr. Michael G. Mulhall, fellow of the Statistical Society of London, etc., states that the price of land in the United Kingdom is £33 sterling.

Mr. James Caird, C. B., F. R. S., gives the rent of cultivated land per acre in Great Britain as follows: Thirteen shillings in 1770, 27 shillings in 1850, and 30 shillings in 1878.

Maj. P. G. Craigie, secretary Central Chamber of Agriculture, in an article read before the Statistical Society of London January 15, 1883, states as follows:

"According to Professor Lowe there were 35,000,000 sheep in the United Kingdom in 1845; average weight per fleece, 4½ pounds, giving the weight of clip 157,500,000 pounds. According to Mr. E. Baines, at British Association, Leeds, the wool-clip in 1858 was 190,000,000 pounds. According to Mr. Archibald Hamilton, from Messrs. Hubbard's tables, the wool-clip in 1870 was 159,952,000 pounds. According to Earl Cathcart, from Messrs. Hubbard's tables, the wool-clip in 1875 was 124,000,000 pounds. According to Mr. J. A. Clark, from Messrs. Hubbard's tables, the wool-clip in 1878 was 119,473,000 pounds. According to Sir James Caird the wool-clip in 1878 was 136,000,000 pounds. According to Messrs. Helmuth, Segwartze & Co.'s wool circular the wool-clip in 1880 was 157,000,000 pounds. According to Bradford Observer the wool-clip in 1882 was 129,000,000 pounds."

The following information, given by Sir James Caird, in his work entitled "The Landed Interest and the Supply of Food," may be of service to you:

Gross annual value of land assessed to the income tax of 1857 and 1875.

	1857.	1875.	Increase.	Increase.	Capital value on increase at thirty years' purchase.
				Per cent.
England	£41,177,000	£50,125,000	£8,948,000	21	£268,440,000
Scotland	5,932,000	7,493,000	1,561,000	26	46,830,000
Ireland (from 1862)	8,747,000	9,293,000	546,000	6	16,380,000
Total	55,856,000	66,911,000	11,055,000		331,650,000

Mr. Caird adds:

"The total rise within a period of eighteen years has been little over 20 per cent.; but, as will be seen by the annexed table, the proportion of increase on the Scotch rental has been greater than that of England. The small rise in Ireland presents a striking contrast to England and Scotland. The capital value of land in this country (the United Kingdom) will be reckoned something prodigious, especially by those of us who are old enough to recall the dismal prophecies of the agricultural ruin which would surely follow the free admission of foreign corn.

"This vast increase in the value of landed property within the short period of twenty years is very remarkable. It has been already shown that the improvement expenditure effected by loans has been fifteen millions. If we assume that even three times as much has been effected during the same period by private capital without loans, we here see that the capital wealth of the owners of landed property has been increased by three hundred and thirty-one millions sterling in these twenty years, at a cost to them which probably has not exceeded sixty millions. This increase, as elsewhere explained, has arisen chiefly from the great advance in the consumption and value of meat and dairy produce, and is thus only in part the result of land improvement.

"But though in the aggregate the land owners of England have become richer by more than one-fifth, and those of Scotland by more than one-fourth, the progress has not been uniform. In the purely corn districts and on the chalk and sands of the drier counties, where grass does not thrive, the increase has been small. On the poor clays there has been none. It has been greatest in the grazing counties and in the West and North. The increase shown in Scotland deserves special attention. In that country the larger proportion of grazing land no doubt partly explains this; but, on the other hand, entails are more strict, and the land is understood to be more heavily mortgaged than in England, so that in these respects Scotland has no advantage."

I am unable to procure any information for a series of years showing the wool clip in Australasia. The best indication, as I have stated above, is the table on raw wool exported, inclosed.

The number of sheep in the Argentine Republic in 1883, according to the Department of Agriculture, was 75,000,000. I am unable to procure data as to the number of sheep in that country for a series of years.

An article on the wool supply read before the Statistical Society of London by Archibald Hamilton, esq., gives an approximate estimate of the number of sheep and lambs and weight of wool in the following countries:

Countries.	Date of returns.	Sheep and lambs.	Weight of wool.
United Kingdom	1867-1870	34,133,000*	154,169,000
Australia	1868	37,441,000	152,100,000

New Zealand	1868	8,418,000	28,875,000

Respectfully, yours,

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] has not consumed by five minutes the whole of the time belonging to his side of the House. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED], if he is in the Hall, to control the time on the other side. If not, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] will be recognized for that purpose.

Mr. BURROWS. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY].

Mr. DINGLEY. I have listened to the speech of my distinguished friend from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], who is always lively if not exact, with a great deal of interest; and I have observed that as the basis of his remarks he assumes that whatever duty may be imposed upon an imported article increases the burden to the consumer not only on the imported article itself, but on all similar products made in this country to the extent of the duty. That was the burden of his argument; and unless the assumption is true, the argument itself falls to the ground. The gentleman was pleased to tell us that the duty upon wool and woolens increased the cost of three hundred millions of woolens manufactured in this country and imported in 1880 to the extent of $176,000,000, reaching his result by multiplying the total amount imported and the total amount produced in this country by the amount of duty. It was surprising to me that my friend from Illinois had not hesitated for a moment in presenting this argument in view of the possible conclusions that would result from such an assumption.

If it is true that the cost of woolens to the people of this country in 1880 was increased both on the imported articles and on the domestic product to the extent of the duty—namely, $176,000,000—then the same is true as to every other article manufactured in this country on which duties are imposed——

Mr. SPRINGER. That does not follow.

Mr. DINGLEY. Certainly it does. Indeed my friend from Illinois will remember that he published in the North American Review a few years ago a table, based on this assumption, in which he figured out that the people of the United States paid a tax of over $600,000,000 in that year by means of duties imposed on articles which we produced in this country. He included cottons, woolens, and iron goods in his tables. A Senator from Texas, on the same assumption, has figured the amount at $1,000,000,000, and President Cleveland has repeated the assertion.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. Will the gentleman allow me to ask a question?

Mr. DINGLEY. Certainly.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. As I understand, the argument of the gentleman from Maine, both to-day and heretofore, has been that where there is an imported article which comes into competition with an article produced in this country——

Mr. DINGLEY. To the extent of our wants.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. The consumer does not pay the tax.

Mr. DINGLEY. That is, a duty on such an article does not increase the burden of the consumer.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. Then I ask the gentleman why in framing the wool tariff there is allowed to the manufacturer a compensating duty for the duty he has paid on the wool?

Mr. DINGLEY. I will answer that question before I conclude.

I wonder, Mr. Chairman, that my distinguished friend from Illinois did not feel a tinge of suspicion that there was some error in the assumption on which he based his destructive figures, when he compared such fearful burdens imposed by his arithmetic on the tax-payers through protection, with the most prosperous country on the face of the earth. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. DINGLEY. Certainly.

Mr. SPRINGER. I did not state that the proposition applied to all other articles of like character.

Mr. DINGLEY. Why not, if it applies at all?

Mr. SPRINGER. I will tell my friend. The honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCKINLEY] stated the rule very fairly, and it has been stated here frequently, that where the home product does not equal the home demand for the goods——

Mr. DINGLEY. And where they can not be produced here to the extent of our wants.

Mr. SPRINGER. Where they are not produced, and where the foreign goods must come in to supply the deficiency, the price of the foreign product plus the duty fixes the price in the home market.

Mr. DINGLEY. But the gentleman understands that we can produce all the woolen goods that this country consumes, with our present mills, and are producing 85 per cent.

Mr. SPRINGER rose.

Mr. DINGLEY. I do not desire to yield all my time.

Mr. SPRINGER. I simply wanted to avoid being misrepresented. The principle does not apply as the gentleman states at all.

Mr. DINGLEY. I wonder, too, that it did not flash on my friend's mind that if 47 per cent. of "robbery"—for that is the gentle phrase which our Democratic friends apply to a duty imposed on articles which we can produce here—if 47 per cent. average duty under the present tariff "robbed" the people of $176,000,000 on their woolens, and $600,000,000 on all articles, then the 40 per cent. "average duty" of the Mills bill would "rob" only 7 per cent. less—still leaving the whole "robbery" $558,000,000. [Laughter.]

I want to ask my friend from Illinois how he justifies 40 per cent. "robbery" in the Mills bill, for if his assumption and the assumption of every gentleman who has spoken on the other side be true—that a duty imposed on an article that can be made here to the extent of our wants increases the cost of both imported and domestic articles to the amount of the duty—then the only difference between the present law and the Mills bill is that the former "robs" six hundred millions and the latter five hundred and fifty-eight millions.

Mr. SPRINGER. Has it not been reduced?

Mr. DINGLEY. You say the whole system is wrong. But this bill puts 40 per cent. on woolens, and how do you justify 40 per cent. of robbery?

Mr. SPRINGER. I justify it in this way: The interests of this country have grown up under this system which was imposed upon the people.

Mr. REED. Why not buy them out? Two years would capitalize the whole of them.

Mr. SPRINGER. We have no power to buy them.

Mr. DINGLEY. But if your assumption is correct how can you justify your 40 per cent. of robbery?

Mr. SPRINGER. This bill is not a free-trade bill; it is for the reduction of excessive duties upon certain articles.

Mr. DINGLEY. On your theory it is a robbery bill. A tariff of 47 per cent. you say is 47 per cent. robbery, and you propose one of 40 per cent. You ought to quit higgling on it. [Applause on the Republican side.] You have put the per cent. at 40, and do not you believe that to be robbery?

Such an excuse as that made by a gentleman who holds that a duty imposed on an article which can be made here to the extent of our wants, is a tax which increases the burdens of the consumer of both imported and domestic articles to the extent of the duty, for cutting down 47 per cent. of "robbery" to only 40 per cent. instead of crushing entirely out of existence such a monstrous imposition, is utterly unworthy the gentleman from Illinois. I can not believe that he would consent to this if he really believed as he says he does. Certainly if I believed what the gentleman from Illinois has declared—what most of the gentlemen who have spoken on the other side have repeated—as to the effect of a protective duty, I never would vote for a duty on any article that can be produced here to the extent of our wants.

Mr. Chairman, I believe, Republicans believe, that a duty imposed on an article which can be produced here to the extent of our wants does not impose burdens upon the consumer. On the contrary, we believe it so encourages home industries by restricting the importations of similar foreign products and holding our own markets for the products of our own labor, that its general effect is to give greater opportunities and better rewards to labor and greater prosperity to the whole people—in short, that all citizens find that it takes less labor, less service, and less of the products of the farm and workshop to buy each of the protected articles than it would cost under free trade. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maine has expired.

Mr. BURROWS. I yield two minutes more.

Mr. DINGLEY. And experience has demonstrated the correctness of this view. The present tariff imposes a duty of 40 per cent. on common cotton sheeting and prints; yet any one can buy sheeting or common prints as cheap in any town of the United States as he can buy in Great Britain in the face of 40 per cent. duty. The price here is not the foreign plus the duty, but the lowest price for which the goods can be made here, using our higher cost of labor. The protection to our industry has reduced the cost of these goods 30 per cent. less than they were before the war. So with common clothing. It can be bought nearly as low here as in England; and even where the proportion of labor in any commodity is large such an article can always be bought here for less labor service or products than it could have been if we had free trade.

To apply this principle to the case in hand, Republicans hold that by protecting our wool-growers and wool-manufacturers, we encourage the home production of wool, induce our farmers to improve their breeds, and thus increase the weight and quality of fleece, give them increased prosperity, and make them better customers of every other class of producers, and at the same time so increase the world's supply of wool as to reduce the price all over the world, although still retaining our own markets for our own wool, and thus reduce the cost of clothing. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Thus we see that under the workings of this protective principle we have cheaper wool and cheaper cloth than we had before the war, while at the same time the farmer (until the Mills bill forced down prices by its threat of free wool) obtains more for his wool, because he has been encouraged to improve his flocks and treble the weight of the fleece.

The gentleman from Illinois has quoted part of a statement which I made the other day that the first effect of free wool would be to seriously reduce the price of wool, but he omitted to add the other part of the statement, that after free wool had destroyed our flocks and one-sixth of the world's product had fallen out, then foreigners would advance the price and we should be obliged to pay more than before for wool and for clothing, and more for our mutton, while our farmers would be obliged to curtail their purchases to the extent of loss of revenue from their wool.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. BURROWS. I will yield to the gentleman five minutes longer.

Mr. DINGLEY. There is another point to which I wish to refer. I have not time to go into any lengthy argument. I wish I had. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] has claimed the effect of the duty on wool has been to encourage and to drive our manufacturers into the use of adulterants. Does not my friend know that no countries use a larger proportion of adulterants than England and Belgium, and that we in this country have less adulterants than any other nation on the face of the earth? Our goods are purer and better than any others. That is the experience in reference to the goods which are imported, and the goods which we manufacture here. Goods imported into this country, like cheviots, when they came to be thoroughly examined, attention having been called to the fact that they had been valued so much below what was supposed to be the cost, were found to be largely dog's hair.

Now, there is nothing in the experience of our manufacturing interests to support the theory upon which the gentleman from Illinois has made his speech. On the contrary our experience has been that our manufacturing industries have prospered and have been diversified, and our agricultural interests have prospered just in proportion as by our protective policy we have developed and retained our home markets for our industries. In that proportion has our prosperity gone on. More than that. In the same proportion the cost of the articles of clothing consumed by our people measured in labor becomes less than ever before. That is one of the strong reasons why to-day we have the most prosperous country on the face of the earth. It is for that reason we have to-day a home market which furnishes more products of a better quality and at a cheaper rate, measured in labor, than the home markets of Great Britain. It is our protective policy which has accomplished this thing, and it is our protective policy in reference to wool-growing that has developed this industry in this country, and if we continue to protect and support it we will be able to supply all that will be needed by the consumers of this country.

The entire amount of clothing wool imported last year was 23,000,000 pounds, while the production of the country was 250,000,000 pounds. The other wools imported were the coarse carpet wools. There is not a single article produced in this country but can be made of the wool grown here.

The argument is that we can not grow them all, that we must have imported wools to mix with those raised here. That simply means this, that we must have a wool which can be obtained at a cheaper rate to be mixed with our wools for the purpose of deteriorating the quality of the goods and decreasing the cost. There is nothing in that position.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. Let me propound a question to the gentleman.

Mr. DINGLEY. Certainly.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. If the gentleman's contention be true, that the consumer of the article does not pay the tariff tax on it, why in making up that woolen schedule does he always allow the manufacturer of the goods to exact the tax he is supposed to have paid on the wool consumed, and in addition a protective tax for himself?

Mr. DINGLEY. But the gentleman must bear in mind this fact, that the difference in price to-day between this market and any foreign market is constantly maintained. But the foreign price has been reduced by the fact that protection has developed the industry in this country. If this industry had not been developed in this country under a protective system, the foreign price would have been higher.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. But the point is this: If he, as a consumer of wool, has not paid the tariff tax under the law, why do you allow him, or affect to allow him, his protective duty? You give a specific duty first, and that tax he is supposed to have paid; and then you add an ad valorem tax as a further protection. Now, if he has not paid the first tax, why do you allow him the latter?

Mr. DINGLEY. The gentleman goes upon the old assumption that the duty adds to the price to the consumer. For the purpose of protecting against the foreign markets the specific duty is given equal to the value of the imported commodity. It does not follow that when the goods are sold all that is added; because the manufacturer does not import his wool. He uses domestic wool, and the price is hardly ever, I may say almost never, the foreign price with the duty added. It is a price between the two, and made by competition.

Mr. BYNUM. Do I understand the gentleman to hold that the domestic manufacturers do not consume foreign wool?

Mr. DINGLEY. To a certain extent they do.

Mr. BYNUM. I understood his argument to be that they only used the domestic wool.

Mr. DINGLEY. There is but a small percentage of foreign clothing wool consumed, only 23,000,000 pounds last year, as against 250,000,000 pounds of domestic wool.

Mr. BYNUM. Is it not true that the great complaint of the manufacturers of this country is that a part, and a very large part, too, of the carpet wool goes into the manufacture of clothing?

Mr. DINGLEY. Under the name of "waste" a very considerable amount of "noils" and "wool-tops" has been imported at a duty of only 10 cents a pound. It was imported under the name of waste, and should have paid a duty of 30 cents a pound.

Mr. BYNUM. Well, is it not true that there are about $45,000,000 of manufactured woolen goods imported?

Mr. DINGLEY. Nearly that amount.

But the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] stated that he would print with his speech the protest of the woolen-manufacturing association, of which Mr. Whitman is president, against the present tariff.

Mr. SPRINGER. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I said that a statement was made by him to the Secretary of the Treasury in regard to the difficulties under which the woolen manufacturers are now laboring——

Mr. DINGLEY. Yes, and by a regulation of the Treasury Department holding that worsteds are not woolens. Mr. Whitman made an argument to the Secretary of the Treasury, and he ruled that worsteds—and they are simply combed wool, and cassimeres and ordinary goods are carded wool; one is carded and the other combed, that is the only difference between them—but the Secretary of the Treasury ruled that worsteds are not woolen goods.

Mr. BYNUM. That is not the ruling of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. DINGLEY. Well, however that decision came it has been made.

Mr. BYNUM. The Secretary of the Treasury ruled that worsteds are worsteds.

Mr. DINGLEY. Precisely; but a fair interpretation of the ruling is that worsteds are woolens, and if that interpretation had been corrected, instead of forty-four millions of goods imported last year there would not have been twenty millions. And it is in view of that, which all agree ought to have been corrected, that the woolen manufacturers are suffering to such an extent to-day.

Mr. SPRINGER. The statement to which I alluded, and which I will publish in my remarks, did not relate to that subject at all.

Mr. DINGLEY. Oh, I beg the gentleman's pardon, I think it did.

Mr. SPRINGER. It did not. It will appear in the RECORD.

Mr. DINGLEY. I do not know what the gentleman will print in the RECORD; but I understood him to say that Mr. William Whitman had presented a memorial to the Treasury Department.

Mr. SPRINGER. We can end the matter at once if the gentleman will just take the trouble to read that speech.

Mr. DINGLEY. I heard what the gentleman said.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope the gentleman will read and carefully digest the speech. He will find it useful information.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois, in closing his speech, spoke in glowing words of the beneficent results which would flow from the Mills bill when enacted into law. According to that gentleman it is to lift heavy burdens from the people, sweep away taxes on food and necessaries of life, remove the "restrictions" of commerce, set the wheels of industry into more active motion, and make even our desert places blossom like the rose.

As I listened to the prophecies of my exuberant friend, my eyes fell on the paragraphs in the Mills bill imposing a duty of 68 per cent. on sugar—an article of food as necessary as flour in every poor man's family, and produced to so small an extent in this country that home competition does not materially affect the price, and therefore an article to whose price the duty is inevitably added. Is sugar the article of food to which my friend referred when he spoke of the Mills bill as sweeping away "taxes on food?"

Or perhaps my friend refers to rice, on which the Mills bill places a duty of 100 per cent.

Oh! no. My friend is thinking only of articles which we can produce in this country to the extent of our wants, where the duty is not added to the cost, but has the effect to hold our own markets for the products of our own labor, and to make every one of them cost less in labor, less in service, and less in any kind of products than would have been possible if protective duties had not been imposed.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. We have cut down both these duties more than most things in the bill.

Mr. REED. Cut them down! Why do you not stop "robbery" entirely?

Mr. BYNUM. I wish to ask the gentleman whether the rates fixed in the Mills bill are not far below the rates that were fixed by the Republican party in the revision of 1883?

Mr. DINGLEY. No, not reduced from the equivalent ad valorem rate intended when the revision of 1883 was made. The House first fixed the duty on raw sugar, such as is imported, at a specific rate equivalent to about 44 per cent. The Senate was forced by the fact that a Louisiana Senator held the balance of power to consent to an increase of the rate, supposed then to be but little more than 50 per cent., although, in consequence of the decline of sugar, the ad valorem equivalent proved a little more than that in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884. So that in fact the equivalent 68 per cent. duty proposed by the Mills bill on raw sugar, such as is imported, is more than the equivalent ad valorem on such sugar intended in the revision of 1883. No reason can be given for reducing advanced manufactures to 40 per cent. ad valorem, which gives no more protection than 30 per cent. specific, and keeping sugar at 68 per cent. specific.

Mr. BYNUM. Is not what you have stated about sugar true of every other article, and therefore does not the bill which we have reported here contain higher rates of duty than your own party said were high enough in 1883? And yet you are fighting against a reduction of rates which you yourself say are higher than those in your act of 1883. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. DINGLEY. I am here fighting against reductions that tend to destroy the industries of this country [applause on the Republican side], and I am here fighting to cut down duties on food-products not produced in this country to any considerable extent. In other words, I am here fighting for a protective tariff that will give our home market to our own industries. You are fighting for a tariff that shall allow foreigners to come in here and obtain control of our market. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. Why do you oppose every tariff for the benefit of the farmer and that does not benefit the monopolist and manufacturer?

Mr. DINGLEY. Talk about benefiting the farmer! Here is a bill brought in here to slaughter all the farming interests in the North [applause on the Republican side], and then having slaughtered all our Northern farming interests you impose upon them a tax of 68 per cent. on sugar and 100 per cent. on rice. Do you call that a bill for the interest of the farmer? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SOWDEN. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. SOWDEN. The point of order I make is that gentlemen should address themselves to the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BYNUM. He can have more time.

Mr. DINGLEY. If I only had the time I would be very glad to answer all questions that may be put on the other side.

The CHAIRMAN. The time is controlled by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS].

Mr. DINGLEY. What I have said, Mr. Chairman, explains the difference between the Mills bill and such a protective bill as the amendments offered by the Republicans would have changed this bill into—such as will be ultimately framed as a substitute for it.

The Mills bill cuts to the point of danger or places on the free-list articles which we can produce here to the extent of our wants, and thereby invites importations to come in and take the place of domestic products or goods, and places its highest duties on articles which can not be produced here to the extent of our demand, and which are necessary as food.

A Republican protective tariff removes entirely duties on articles which can not be produced here, like tea, coffee, etc.; reduces duties on articles which can be produced here in small proportion of our wants, especially where they are articles of common necessity, like sugar, and places duties on articles which can be produced here to the extent of our wants at such a point as will practically hold our own markets for our own industries and labor.

Gentlemen have held up the fact that the Mills bill bears an "average" duty of 40 per cent., against 47 per cent. under the present tariff, and this rate increased from 41 per cent. by the heavy duties on sugar and rice, as evidence that it is still sufficiently protective. Indeed, within a few days it has been given out that the Mills bill is really a protective tariff, notwithstanding the gentlemen who framed it and have advocated it have all been denouncing protection as "robbery."

Mr. Chairman, I desire to call attention to the fact that a tariff can be easily framed with an "average" duty of 40 per cent. and still be essentially non-protective; in fact, in its essential features carry out the free-trade idea of removing largely restrictions on importations, or another bill may be framed with the same "average" duty and yet be thoroughly protective. The "average" duty indicates nothing; it is how the rates are distributed, and especially how the free-list is made up, that tells the story.

The Mills bill is the first one that I have described, and in its main features it is designed to encourage importations and to move in free-trade directions.

Note, first, that it places on the free-list fifty industries heretofore protected. Among these industries the products of the farm stand first. Wool, meats, beans, pease, and all vegetables except potatoes are given up to free trade. Manufactured lumber, shingles, clapboards, staves, bricks, undressed building stone, jute bags, hoop-iron for ties, and many other articles are also given up to free trade.

Not only this, but the duties on manufactured articles are changed to ad valorem duties, which invite undervaluations and practically make such duties 10 per cent. less than they appear on the face, and then even these are cut to the point where importation will be inevitably increased, and to the extent that they are increased the demand for our own products and our own labor reduced.

And the extent of this cut is skillfully covered up by retaining such large duties as 68 per cent. on sugar and 100 per cent. on rice—twice the rates given articles which we can produce here to the extent of our wants—which serve to keep the "average" up to 40 per cent., while if the duty on these articles should be reduced to 40 per cent. the "average" would go down to 35 per cent.

On the other hand, a truly protective bill which should give an average duty of 40 per cent. would restore to the dutiable list a large part of the articles put on the free-list by the Mills bill, would reduce the duty on sugar and rice to 40 per cent., the average of the protected lists, and would thus yield adequate protection to those industries of our country which can supply our wants; would cut down the enormous duty on necessary articles of food, would discourage importations of goods that we can make ourselves, and increase the prosperity of the people.

Mr. REED. I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GEAR].

Mr. GEAR. Mr. Chairman, I ask the Clerk to read the first three paragraphs of the letter which I send to the desk, the whole of which may be published in the RECORD.

The Clerk read a portion of the following letter:

OFFICE OF ISAIAH MEEK, Bonaparte, Iowa, May 21, 1888.

DEAR SIR: In reply to yours of the 19th instant, I would say:

1. That our factory commenced operations in 1854 and was in full blast in 1859, and we have been running continuously since that time, except from July, 1863, to March, 1864, which time, having been burned out, we were rebuilding our factory. We have run continuously since then, except short stops in the winter for repairs.

2. The volume of our business is larger than before the war, because we have a great deal more machinery and better facilities for manufacturing. Taking, however, the amount of machinery we had before the war and our facilities for conducting the business, we had proportionately as large, if not a larger, amount of business then, and I know with more profit to us.

4. Our business was much more profitable before the war than now.

5. If the Mills bill passed with its provisions for the reduction of the wool tariff, it is my opinion it would not reduce the volume of our business, but have a tendency to increase it. It would, if passed, increase our profits, and consequently our ability to increase wages of operatives. In our experience, however, the question of wages is regulated by the law of supply and demand wholly, and not affected by the tariff.

In my opinion the number of sheep has largely decreased in VanBuren County since 1860. I am a sheep breeder, and while the sheep industry, taken for a succession of years, is always a profitable business, the profit before the tariff was put on wool was as great, and some years greater than now.

6. With reference to wages paid before the war and now I have forgotten, and am unable to answer. I find on reference to my books that we paid our boss carder in 1865 the same wages we pay now.

Truly yours,

ISAIAH MEEK.

Mr. GEAR. Mr. Chairman, that letter covers a period of thirty-four years. It has been read in the House heretofore upon the request of the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. MCKINNEY]. He arraigned me, I think, very unfairly and unjustly in regard to the remarks I made some time ago on the subject of the tariff. He intimated that I knew nothing about manufacturing—perhaps not as much as the gentleman who wrote that letter. I do not claim to know very much about manufacturing, although I have had some experience in that direction. But, as I said, that letter covers the long period of thirty-four years, embracing action under the tariff of 1846, the tariff of 1857, and the tariff of 1861—the Morrill tariff. Now, I will undertake to show so clearly that "he who runs may read," that under the tariff of 1846 and the tariff of 1857 Mr. Meeks sold goods higher and bought wool lower than he is doing to-day under the present tariff.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS], the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, made in my judgment, the most bald and naked statement in regard to the manufacture of blankets that I ever heard in my life from any man on a legislative floor. In my former remarks I illustrated this. He said, in substance, given a pair of blankets of which the cost of manufacture was $2.55, the "robber baron tariff" added thereto, $1.90, making the cost $4.45; and in the case of another pair of blankets which he used as an illustration, he said the cost was $2.70, and the "robber baron tariff" added to the price $2.55, making in all $5.25 the cost, thereby leaving the impression by inference that to these figures he gave, an additional amount was added by way of profit.

But you may look through the gentleman's speech from beginning to end, and you can not find one line where he gives the price at which the blankets were sold by the manufacturer, either at wholesale or retail.

In the illustration which I gave to the House and the country, I took the amount of wool and the cost of the blankets at his own figures, and I showed conclusively, in my judgment, and I think in the judgment of the House, that the wholesale or retail price, adding the tariff, was less than the price given by the distinguished gentleman from Texas, and that the prices clear through, both at wholesale and retail, were less. In evidence of that fact and of the fact that the cost of material was less and the price of the product higher during the period to which I have referred, 1846 to 1861, I send to the desk a dispatch to be read. Before it is read I wish to make this remark: My friend Meeks is an iron-clad, rock-rooted Democrat. He has voted the Democratic ticket ever since he has been a voter, in season and out of season. He voted the Democratic ticket all through the crucial period of the war. As a matter of course, he would be expected to stand up and vote the Democratic ticket to-day and defend every measure of his party, as he and his friends expect, as I understand, that he will be placed in nomination for Congress this year on that blanket letter. At the time he started he had a poor mill, as he states himself. It was almost the only mill in that country. He had but little or no competition. He had the old-fashioned single looms. (I call the attention of my friend from New Hampshire [Mr. MCKINNEY] to this. He preaches, I understand, the doctrine that in the future there are rewards, but no punishment—a good doctrine—and therefore he is at liberty to make any statement he pleases.) [Laughter.] My friend, Mr. Meeks, had that kind of a mill—poor in quality. He had looms which had in them only one or two harnesses to the loom, as they are known technically to the trade (and I speak whereof I know), throwing one or two shuttles at a time, on which but few varieties of goods could be made—looms which can not compare at all with those of modern times which have six, fifteen, and twenty-seven harnesses, throwing four, six, and eight shuttles, and making a large variety of goods. His goods cost him something more at that time to make than now, but he got for them a much higher price than he gets now, and he bought his material cheaper. Now I ask the Clerk to read that telegram.

The Clerk read as follows:

KEOSAUQUA, IOWA, June 20, 1888.

Hon. JOHN H. GEAR:

Meek and his old clerk examined the firm books and can only find one entry between dates described; one pair blankets sold for $7.50 in 185 , which was about average price. Weight not given; wool worth that time, 20 to 22 cents.

J. W. ROWLEY.

Mr. GEAR. I ask the Clerk to read this dispatch from another mill in an adjoining county, which gives more specific proof of the truth of my argument.

The Clerk read as follows:

MEDIAPOLIS, IOWA, July 6, 1888.

Hon. JNO. H. GEAR, Washington:

The Northfield Woolen Mills in 1859 sold 9-ounce jeans at 79 to 80 cents per yard; 5-ounce flannel, 50 to 60 cents, and 5-pound blankets, $6.70 per pair, and paid for unwashed wool 15 to 18 cents per pound. Now, 9-ounce jeans 50 to 60 cents per yard; 5-ounce flannel, 35 to 38 cents, and 5-pound blankets, $5 per pair, and pay for unwashed wool 20 to 24 cents per pound.

ROBINSON & DAVIS.

Mr. GEAR. This Robinson & Davis mill has been in operation longer than has Mr. Meek's. I know the firm well; have known them over forty years. Their telegram shows clearly that under the tariff of 1846 and 1857 they bought their wool at 30 to 40 per cent. less than they do now, and that they sold blankets and other products at 30 or 40 per cent. higher rates than now. This evidence is also confirmed by a letter from D. W. Jones, of Delaware County, Iowa, written to my colleague [Mr. D. B. HENDERSON] in which he states that he is selling blankets and other products of his mill at 33 per cent. less than in 1859–'60. Mr. Jones, my colleague tells me, has been engaged in manufacturing for many years and furnishes at the mills in his section of the State a sure home market for the wool grown in his vicinity. Their statement also proves the truth of the protection theory in a nutshell: that by a fair protection the Iowa and other wool-growers are to-day getting better prices for wool than under the Walker tariff. It also proves conclusively that under the protection theory of giving the American market to the American manufacturer he has, under the stimulus of home competition, introduced better machinery and better methods whereby he has been able to manufacture better goods and sell them at less rates to the consumer than at any time in the history of the country.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this proves the position I took at the start, that the men who grow the wool under protection do get a higher price for their wool product, while, at the same time, the manufacturers of woolen goods are able to sell their goods at a lower price to the consumers.

In the tariff of 1846 wool was 30 per cent. ad valorem. Under the tariff of 1857 it was 24 per cent. It seems to me the argument is clear and conclusive that they who oppose this Mills bill, which my friend from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] says is not a free-trade bill, although it puts wool on the free-list, if the effect of protecting the product of wool in this country has been to increase the price of wool to our farmers, while at the same time it has reduced the price of woolen goods to the consumer, then by parity of reasoning, judging from past results, wool being placed upon the free-list, the result will be that while the price of wool will be lower, the price of woolen goods to the consumer will be higher.

Mr. Chairman, the farmers of my district have an interest in this question of free wool. They own nearly one hundred thousand sheep, and the bare threat of passing the Mills bill has already reduced the price of this year's clip of wool over 15 per cent. It naturally follows that the Iowa farmers are not in favor of this measure, and they ask me to oppose it by my vote, which I shall do as long as I am here to protect their interests.

I am necessarily hurried in the limited time allowed me and must pass along rapidly. But I wish to say a word to the House in reference to the tariff of 1846, to which the Speaker of this House referred in words of eulogy in reference to the effect of that tariff upon the country. I will not attempt to analyze his speech, as it was done most forcibly by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] the other day. But I wish to call attention to this one fact: that during those years that produce was low throughout the West, lower in fact than it had been since the great financial crash of 1837.

During the period of the Walker tariff occurred the terrible famine in Ireland, and the continent of Europe was convulsed by the Crimean war. This state of affairs made an abnormal demand for our breadstuffs and meat products.

Again, Mr. Chairman, during that memorable epoch in American history California was acquired and yielded to the hardy pioneers her untold millions of treasure. Yet, sir, notwithstanding all these adventitious circumstances the balance of trade was largely against us during the years of the Walker tariff. Sir, it required to settle that balance of trade which had accumulated during those fifteen years two hundred and fifty millions of dollars in addition to our exports of farm products.

But our friends on the Democratic side claim that the balance of trade being against us is not a subject worthy of attention.

I was educated in a different school. My business preceptor was a Democrat, a bosom friend of Douglas and the father-in-law of the recently appointed Chief-Justice. He taught me, sir, that the prudent business man, whether merchant or farmer, when he wanted to find out at the end of the year the condition of his business affairs, put down on one side his receipts and on the other side his expenditures. If he found that his receipts were more than his expenditures the result was that he had made money; or, in other words, the balance of trade was in his favor. If, on the contrary, his expenditures exceeded his receipts, the result was that he had lost money and that the balance of trade was against him. Now, Mr. Chairman, what is true in regard to the business of an individual is equally true in regard to the nation.

It seems, therefore, that when the balance of trade is against a nation, as it always has been against this nation from 1832, whenever we had these tariffs for revenue only or a quasi free-trade tariff we have been in debt to foreign nations and have had to export our coin to settle the balance of trade. I am frank to say that I prefer a policy which tends to bring the coin of the world to us in return for our products rather than the policy put in operation by the Democratic tariff of 1846 to 1857.

I had intended to reply to a letter which my distinguished friend from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] said he received from Mr. Meek, the manufacturer of those blankets. I have asked him again and again to produce the letter, but with that lack of candor which is his political characteristic he has refused to do so every time. [Laughter.]

He charged me in his speech with having changed front on the protection question. I stand here, as I have always stood in my own State as a member of the Republican party, in favor of fair protection to the industries in this country, and in my message sent to the General Assembly of my State some years ago, from which the gentleman quoted, on the question of the reduction of the duty on steel rails, I had investigated that question with some care. I found that we had paid a duty of $28 a ton on steel rails; that when this duty was levied the manufacture was an experiment in this country. Although many of the establishments which began manufacturing steel rails were unfortunate, yet better methods having been introduced in the manufacture of rails thereby increasing the output and thus cheapening the product and increasing the demand so that under the protection of $28 per ton rails had declined from $155 to $42 or $44 per ton, therefore it seemed to me that the time had come for a reduction, and that under the stimulus of invention rails and better methods could be produced at less cost. I urged the reduction.

Mr. Chairman, it is not the first time that the voice of Republican Iowa has given tone to Republican legislation on this and other questions; and in accordance with that suggestion a Republican Congress reduced the rate to the existing duty of $17 per ton. The result has been that the American manufacturers, having the home market for their product, have been enabled by competition to produce the best rail known at the lowest rate ever produced. And this result, Mr. Chairman, is another argument in favor of a fair degree of protection to American industries.

Sir, I am, in common with the Republican party of Iowa, in favor of a fair protection to American industries and productions of all kinds. I am ready by my vote at any time to aid in revising the tariff in such manner as may be found to be both for the interests of the producer, the wage-worker, and consumer; and I am in favor of such an adjustment as will give the American manufacturer the benefit of the American market, and at the same time give the American workman "a fair days' wage for a fair days' work," rather than to adopt a policy that will bring our wage-worker to a level with those of Great Britain or Europe. Sir, the bill under consideration does not do this; on the contrary, it is an assault on many of the industries and productions of the country, which under the protection policy of the Republican party for the past quarter of a century, have grown and developed and placed us in the front rank of nations in regard to wealth, prosperity, and comfort among all our people.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine has control of the time; to whom does he yield?

Mr. REED. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER].

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I would not again occupy the time of the committee were it not that the discussion of free wool—on which subject I had intended to submit some observations when it was before under discussion—has been reopened by the Democratic side. Apparently, not content with having already voted to put wool on the free-list, they seem exceedingly anxious to hold a post mortem on this important industry which they have done their best to destroy, and have called the gentleman from Illinois to their aid. It is barely possible that they have already heard rumblings from the wool-growers of the Northern States, and have resolved by false figures and deflected logic to attempt to mislead those whose industries are threatened with destruction.

Among others, my colleague [Mr. MCKINNEY] raised his voice for free wool. From a hurried reading of his remarks, he seems to have spoken from the Ohio standpoint, in which State, he says, he was once engaged in wool-growing. I do not know how much of a granger my clerical friend may have been in his early years, or how much correct knowledge he may have on sheep-husbandry in Ohio, but I will venture to call his attention to the fact that New Hampshire is greatly interested in the wool question, having nearly as many sheep per capita as Ohio.

New Hampshire in 1880 had 211,825 sheep, and the wool clip for that year was 1,060,589 pounds.

It is, however, a significant circumstance that out of the 211,825 sheep in the State, only about 30,000 of them are in my colleague's district, the remaining 181,000 being in the district I have the honor to represent.

I will not say that this is the reason why my colleague is so valiant an advocate of free wool, but I will say that whether he knows it or not, the farmers of New Hampshire are almost unanimously against placing wool on the free-list, as will be demonstrated when the question is submitted to them next November.

After advocating free wool my colleague declared that placing that product on the free-list will not cheapen it, but that it will make clothing cheaper. That kind of logic is too much for my obtuse intellect and I will not try to master it.

Mr. Chairman, my colleague's attitude on this question suits me exactly from a political standpoint, and I am gratified to know that, in addition to favoring free lumber, free brick, free agricultural products, and other important industries of New Hampshire, he is also for free wool.

A friend of mine, who travels all over New Hampshire, wrote recently that—

> Many farmers who are large wool-growers will vote the Republican ticket this fall for the first time, on account of the tariff question, and there are not a few mechanics similarly situated.

The people of New Hampshire are not indifferent to what is going on in Congress, and will in due time give practical expression to their convictions.

I notice that an importing house in New York City has lately received a consignment of British manufactured woolen goods with the following instructions:

> Have these goods deposited in the United States bonded warehouse, there to await the passage of the Mills bill. In case that bill does not become a law, then hold the goods in bond until the re-election of Cleveland and a Congress that will assure us of a free-trade tariff. You will then put them on the market for sale.

Mr. Chairman, American workingmen will have something to say about the "re-election of Cleveland and a Congress that will assure us of a free-trade tariff," and their decision is liable not to please the British manufacturers who are getting ready to flood our country with cheap goods. [Applause.]

On the issue of free lumber, free agricultural products, and free wool I venture to modestly suggest that New Hampshire will not fail to add one additional Republican to the next Congress, and I doubt not that on this issue other sections of the country will give enough gains to make the next Congress politically in harmony with the administration of President Harrison. [Applause.]

The following words of the lamented Garfield, in the last report he made to this House, are timely and significant. Garfield said:

> Should it (the removal or unjust change of the wool tariff) become a law, it will be impossible for our farmers to compete in the market with the mestiza wools of South America; and it will be equally impossible for our manufacturers to compete with those of France and England. Of course, any legislation that destroys the woolen manufactures is equally destructive to sheep husbandry, for the farmer would no longer have a market for his wool. The nation can hardly be called independent which does not possess the materials and the skill to clothe its own people.

Mr. Chairman, I prefer Garfield to SPRINGER on this subject, and the American people are anxiously waiting for an opportunity to so express themselves at the ballot-box. [Applause.]

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Mr. Chairman, whether it be for good or for ill the discussion on the Mills bill is approaching a termination. Upon next Saturday we will vote upon that measure. It will pass this House, as I am informed and believe, and against the protest of every Republican Representative, with possibly one or two exceptions. It will receive the support of every Democrat in this House, with a very few exceptions.

A MEMBER on the Republican side. Honorable exceptions.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I only desire now to call the attention of the House and of the country to one or two facts in that behalf, and to those facts I invite careful consideration. One is that no industry in this country to be affected by this tariff measure has been accorded a hearing by the Committee on Ways and Means, and that although the industry, now prosperous, will be immediately and disastrously affected by its influence should it become a law.

I call attention to the fact again that no workman in this country whose wages are to be reduced by the operation of the Mills bill has been vouchsafed a hearing before that committee. I call attention to the fact also that no class of our people, no interests affected by the proposed legislation, has been accorded an audience to petition for relief or protest against threatened disaster; but, on the contrary, this bill has been framed and passed without the slightest consultaton with those who represent the vast and growing interests of the United States. But, Mr. Chairman, the day set apart by the Constitution, not only for a hearing, but for final judgment, is approaching; it will be early in November.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to call attention to another fact. It is this, that it is not pretended that this so-called revision of the tariff has been made except from the standpoint of those who favor a tariff for revenue only, which is merely another name for the doctrine of free trade.

It is known to all members on this floor and to the country that this side of the House has from first to last desired and endeavored to revise the tariff with reference to the maintenance of the protective system, and from the standpoint of protectionists, recognizing what that system has done for the country and for the people. The Democratic majority in this House has denied to us the opportunity and defeated all attempts to secure such revision. And from their decision we now appeal to our masters, the people. The issue is fairly presented, and should not be changed, but be referred to the final arbiters, the voters of the country.

I call attention to the fact that so far from reducing the surplus revenues in the Treasury, that accumulation will be increased under the operation of the Mills bill if it shall ever become a law, since importations will be increased under the influence of the peculiar reduction of duties proposed.

I wish to call the attention of the country to another fact in this same behalf. In November next the people of the United States will sit in judgment upon the issue joined between this side of the House and the Democratic majority who are the authors and finishers of this tariff measure. If it is the desire of the people that the tariff shall be revised, as confessedly it ought to be, from the standpoint of protecting the industries of this country, and in a manner consistent therewith, they will transfer the majority from that side of the House to this. If it is their purpose to strike down these great industries of the country as they have the wool and other industries, they will retain the majority on that side of this central aisle.

Rejecting every proposition of the Republican minority, the Democratic majority, having the power, will vote the Mills bill through next Saturday at the hour appointed, and it will go to the Senate, and there I trust it will be referred to a committee that will sit during the recess, in order that the great interests which are to be affected by this measure, which, in its influence, reaches to every hearthstone in the Republic, may be accorded a full and fair hearing, that those who represent the fields, the shops, the mills, mines, furnaces, and factories may all be heard before that committee, even as they will at the polls, and the bill be reported back at the opening of the next session, so modified and changed as to fairly and fully reflect the will of the people of the United States, and in pursuance of the requests of those whose interests are to be immediately affected; and that then, upon the reassembling of Congress in its December session, we may truly and properly respond to the requirements of our constituents, for before that assembling we will receive at the polls in November instructions which we can not fail to understand, and which it will not be wise or safe to disregard. [Applause on the Republican side.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. REED. Mr. Chairman, we have now reached the end of our discussion upon this bill, except in so far as the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means shall himself in person administer to our enlightenment on next Saturday, and it is very curious to contrast the situation and the appearance of the Democracy at the beginning of the discussion with the utterances which they have made to-day.

Throughout the whole general debate not a single speech that I remember was delivered upon the other side which did not contain the principles of free trade as plain as they were ever enunciated by the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX], who is to-day, perhaps, alone on that side not afraid to express his sentiments. [Laughter on the Republican side.] There has been no discussion under the five-minute rule which has not involved the principles of free trade. There has never been an opportunity omitted where a Democrat could mouth about "tariff taxes" where he has not put his tongue around it with affectionate attention, and yet we have to-day the gentleman who was chosen to preside over the deliberations of this committee submitting to us some ideas which indicate that he is a little afraid of being a free-trader himself. Why he, the very inventor of the schedule which showed the amount of robbery that was perpetrated by the "tariff tax" is faltering in his weary task of freeing the American people from the bondage of those infamous creatures who manufacture things that can be used by those who can pay for them.

Why is it that this change has come over their feelings? Why are they so anxious to show that they are not much in favor of free trade? Why are detachments sent over to New York to give reassurance to the doubtful brethren? Why is it that the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, that lofty and courageous citizen of Texas, who dares to explain his views elsewhere, has gone over to New York and declared that they need not fear any free trade from him? Why is it that he has swallowed words that are only four years old, and why is it that he comes back here where he is known and tries neither to swallow them nor to deny them? Why is it that the entire crowd of Democratic newspapers are to-day endeavoring to explain that after all they have great yearning for 40 per cent. of robbery? [Laughter on the Republican side.] Why is it that the gentleman from Indiana was all agog and shaken with emotion in his eagerness to show that the principle on which this bill was framed is as near protective robbery as ever we were? Why is it that he violated the whole courtesy of parliamentary debate in order to thrust that idea upon the public? Why is it that they give him one minute for debate, one minute to ask a question, and nobody else a minute to make an answer? It is because they have begun to hear from the people of the United States. It is because they recognize the fact that the people of the United States are in favor of the American doctrine of protection [applause on the Republican side]; that they are in favor of having the articles which the people of America use made by American workingmen; and from now until election time their greatest effort on the other side will be to explain away the declarations which they so bravely made, and to say that even Mr. Cleveland himself is a genuine protectionist and never meant anything else. [Applause on the Republican side.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] desires me to yield him one minute of my time, which I do.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Chairman, I was very much astonished to find my colleague from the first district of Iowa [Mr. GEAR] so perturbed and excited over this debate. In contrast with his usual fairness and courtesy he took occasion while upon the floor, in a perfectly unjustifiable manner, to make a personal allusion to myself. I can say truthfully that I have never treated my colleagues on this floor in any such manner, and the remark of the gentleman was entirely out of place and in bad taste. I did say in the speech which I delivered on the floor that I had written to Mr. Meek about a pair of blankets which the gentleman exhibited, and that I would in my time during the five-minute debate read Mr. Meek's reply. Now, what right has the gentleman to complain that I did not read it? I will read an extract from what the gentleman said in his speech, and then I will read the letter. The gentleman, after exhibiting the pair of blankets, said:

> Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of this House to the fact that the passage of the pending tariff bill will not only seriously injure the wool-grower of my State, but it will also close up the mill where that blanket was made, and put out of employment the labor engaged in its manufacture.

Before receiving my letter Mr. Meek had already written to a friend of mine concerning the above statement made by my colleague, and a copy of his letter was furnished me. I now print the same without comment:

BONAPARTE, IOWA, May 15, 1888.

DEAR SIR: In reply to yours of the 11th instant, just received, would say that I sold to Mr. John Rowley, editor of the Republican paper at Keosauqua, one pair of blankets, which he informed me were for ex-Governor GEAR. As to my stating to Mr. GEAR, or any one else, that I was opposed to a reduction of the present tariff, I would say that such representation is positively untrue. I did say to him, however, that if the tariff was taken from wool it would greatly benefit me as a manufacturer. I am not only not opposed to the Mills tariff bill, but I hope it will pass and lead to still further reduction of the unnecessary and burdensome war tariff.

In conclusion, I would say that I am heartily in sympathy with the President in his endeavors to reform the administration of the Government, and especially so with all efforts to reduce taxation to the necessities of a Government economically conducted.

Joining with you in desiring the nomination and re-election of Cleveland, I am,

Very truly, yours,

ISAIAH MEEK.

L. A. PALMER, Esq., Washington, D. C.

Mr. GEAR. I ask leave to reply, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, as stated on the other side, this debate, long protracted, is now about to come to a conclusion, and I had hoped that in these last moments there would be a feeling of kindliness pervading the hearts of gentlemen on both sides of the House. [Laughter on the Republican side.] But on the contrary the gentleman from Maine has shown his usual peculiarity of sneering and scolding at this side of the House. He reminds me of the character of Pooh Bah in the Mikado. He was born with a sneer on him and he kept that peculiar facial expression to the day of his death. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] The gentleman has alluded to this side of the House as if we had not maintained our professions made at the beginning of this debate. I call attention to the fact that the gentleman himself, as a member of the Ways and Means Committee, came into this House at the commencement of this discussion with a minority report signed by all the Republican members of that committee, and with a flourish of trumpets promised the House that they would seek to have the bill modified and amended in Committee of the Whole, and that if those efforts failed they would offer a substitute which would surely diminish the revenues without impairing the American system of protection. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Where, oh where, is that substitute?

> Gone glimmering through the dream of things that were—
> A school-boy's tale, the wonder of an hour!

[Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

If they have ever incubated one, they have not had the courage to bring it to the light of day.

A MEMBER on the Republican side. It will come.

Mr. SPRINGER. Let it come and we will be ready to meet it. And in addition to that we are not afraid to go to the country on this issue. [Applause on the Democratic side.] On Saturday next the roll will be called on the passage of this bill, and that roll-call will be heard around the world. It will indicate to the people of this country that their Representatives have been equal to the great emergency that now confronts them of reducing this "vicious, inequitable, and illogical source of unnecessary taxation." [Applause on the Democratic side.] And when we have passed that bill in this House we will meet you on the hustings, gentlemen; we will go to the country with you, and mark my word that in November next the people's voice will be heard in the triumphant re-election of Grover Cleveland. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] spoke about "rumblings" from the people being heard on this subject, and in reply to that suggestion I will have printed as part of my remarks a letter written by Mr. Arthur T. Lyman, treasurer of the Hadley Thread Company, of Holyoke, as well as of the Lowell Manufacturing Company, of Lowell. Mr. Lyman is a Republican and his letter appears in the New York Times. It is as follows:

[New York Times, July 19, 1888.]

IT IS NOT FREE TRADE—AN OLD REPUBLICAN'S SOUND VIEWS OF THE MILLS BILL.

BOSTON, July 18.

The Republicans are not having the best success in soliciting funds from manufacturers. The chairman of the finance committee of the Holyoke Republican Club recently solicited a contribution from Mr. Arthur T. Lyman, who is the treasurer of the Hadley Thread Company, of Holyoke, as well as of the Lowell Manufacturing Company, of Lowell. In reply Mr. Lyman wrote the following letter:

BOSTON, July 13.

"Chairman of the Finance Committee of the Holyoke Republican Club:

"DEAR SIR: I have yours of the 12th, asking for a contribution for the Republican Club. I am of course deeply interested in the tariff as regards the Hadley Company, and also in its bearing on many other cotton and woolen manufactures in which I am interested, but in my opinion the Republican members of Congress from New England and the Home Market Club and the Woolen Manufacturers' Association have practically done more harm to the cause of protection and to the protected (so-called) industries of Massachusetts than the Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee.

"I have had occasion to see some of the Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee, and to hear of the plans and views of others, and I am convinced that but for the action of the Republican members of Congress from New England and of the greater part of the Republican manufacturers of New England we could have had in the Mills bill satisfactory schedules for woolens and cottons. As it is, at the request of some manufacturers (Republicans) made through the Democratic members from Massachusetts the Democrats of the Ways and Means Committee altered and advanced rates on some important items, while we were met, I am informed, by Republican members of the House, saying: "Leave the schedule as it is; it is better for the election." The Republicans now refuse to aid in putting raw materials on the free list, and certainly in New England free raw material has been considered as an element in protection almost as essential as the duty on manufactured articles.

"From my business experience in both importing and manufacturing, I am fully aware of the necessity of protection for the maintenance here of certain manufactures, and I very much regret that the Republican party, with which I have acted from its beginning, has, for political success, taken a position which I consider hostile in its practical effects to the protected industries of Massachusetts.

"The Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee take broad, and on the whole reasonable, views of the tariff question, and while of course they look at the interest of the United states as a whole they do not ignore the fact that many great industries have grown up in this country under the high duties made necessary by the war of the rebellion, and that it is only fair and proper that consideration should be paid to their existence and condition. Neither do they ignore the fact that the working people in the protected industries are very largely members of the Democratic party.

"Besides the consideration that my manufacturing interests have been put at needless risk by the partisan action of the Republicans, I must also take into consideration the interests of the whole country, in which we are all involved, and I can not feel it to be right to vote for any one who can honestly stand on the Republican platform. Most of the Republicans with whom I have spoken about it have told me that they have not read it. I can readily believe that it would be disagreeable reading to Republicans, who in the past have in all honesty desired to have raw materials and food products on the free-list. But the exigencies of practical politics have forced the party into a false position as regards the tariff, and into many unwise and dangerous relations in regard to the domestic and foreign affairs of the country.

"There is practically no party in this country in favor of free trade in any reasonable sense of the term, and it is as unfair to call the Mills bill a free-trade bill as it is to say that the Republicans are in favor of free drinking of whisky, because the manufacturers of protected articles have several years insisted that all internal taxes should be taken off in order that it should be impossible to alter the duties on imports. While the Mills bill is not a bill that wholly commends itself to me, it is correct, and for the interest of Massachusetts in many particulars, notably in the matter of free wool. Every manufacturing country in the world of any consequence except the United States has wool on the free-list. The position which the Republican party has taken makes it well for the country, as it seems to me, that it should not have the control of the Government for the next four years.

"ARTHUR T. LYMAN."

Mr. MILLS. I move that the committee now rise and report this bill to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. MCKINLEY. I ask that there be printed, for the use of the House, the original text of this bill, with the amendments which have been adopted by the Committee of the Whole in italics.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SPRINGER). The Chair thinks that should be done in the House.

Mr. MCKINLEY. Then I will make the request there.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, pending the motion of the gentleman from Texas I ask unanimous consent to recur to page 6 of the bill to amend the provision relating to band-iron. I send my amendment to the desk.

Mr. REED. That is some back town just heard from, I suppose. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

The amendment was read, as follows:

Page 6, line 12, add after the word "baling," the words "or other;" so that it will read: "Iron and steel cotton-ties or hoops, for baling or other purposes, not thinner than No. 20 wire gauge."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas to return to this part of the bill for the purpose indicated by him?

There was no objection.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MILLS. I now move that the committee rise and report the bill with the amendments to the House with the recommendation that it pass.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and

Mr. SPRINGER, the Chairman, said: The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union has had under consideration House bill No. 9051, to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue, and has instructed me to report the same back with sundry amendments and with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to, and the bill so amended passed. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MILLS. I desire to move that the further consideration of this bill be postponed until Saturday next, at half past 11 o'clock.

Mr. MCKINLEY. Before that motion is put, I ask unanimous consent that 2,000 copies of this bill, with the amendments adopted by the Committee of the Whole, be printed at once.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I hope the gentleman will accept as an amendment that the printing be done in pamphlet form.

Mr. SPRINGER. That is better.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCKINLEY] asks unanimous consent that of the bill just reported, with the amendments recommended by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, there be printed 2,000 copies.

Several MEMBERS. Five thousand.

Mr. MCKINLEY. I accept the suggestion of several gentlemen, and will say 5,000 copies.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. How are these to be distributed?

Mr. MCKINLEY. My purpose is to have them distributed equally among members of the House.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I think the order should so state.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the request. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that 5,000 copies of this bill, with the amendments recommended by the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, be printed in document form and furnished to the document-room for distribution among members of the House equally. If there be no objection that order will be made.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. MILLS. I now move that the further consideration of this bill, with the amendments reported, be postponed until half past 11 o'clock on Saturday next.

Mr. MCKINLEY. Will the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means indicate his purpose as to taking a vote on Saturday?

Mr. MILLS. I propose that we shall take a vote as soon as it can be reached—as soon as the debate is closed—to do which I am entitled to one hour under the rules.

Mr. MCKINLEY. On Saturday next?

Mr. MILLS. Yes, sir; on next Saturday I propose that a vote be taken—first on the amendments and then on the bill.

The motion of Mr. MILLS was agreed to.

Mr. MILLS moved to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT ALLENTOWN, PA.

Mr. DIBBLE. I rise to a question of privilege, and call up for present consideration House bill 4357, with the veto message of the President of the United States thereon.

Mr. MILLS. I ask unanimous consent that the House now take a recess until 8 o'clock to-night.

Mr. DIBBLE. I object.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4357) to erect a public building at Allentown, Pa.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase, acquire by condemnation or otherwise provide a site, and cause to be erected thereon a substantial and commodious building, with fire-proof vaults, for the use and accommodation of the post-office and for other Government uses, at the city of Allentown, in the State of Pennsylvania. The site, and building thereon, when completed upon plans and specifications to be previously made and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall not exceed in cost the sum of $100,000; nor shall any site be purchased until estimates for the erection of a building which will furnish sufficient accommodations for the transaction of the public business, and which shall not exceed in cost the balance of the sum herein limited after the site shall have been purchased and paid for, shall have been approved by the Secretary of the Treasury; and no purchase of site nor plan for said building shall be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury involving an expenditure exceeding the said sum of $100,000 for site and building; and the site purchased shall leave the building unexposed to danger from fire by an open space of at least 40 feet, including streets and alleys: Provided, That no part of said sum shall be expended until a valid title to the said site shall be vested in the United States, nor until the State of Pennsylvania shall cede to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same, during the time the United States shall be or remain the owner thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of said State and the service of civil process therein.

The SPEAKER. This bill was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. DIBBLE. That committee has made a report, which is now on the Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report.

The report (by Mr. DIBBLE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the message from the President of the United States returning House bill No. 4357, entitled "An act to erect a public building at Allentown, Pa.," with his objections thereto, have had the same under consideration and respectfully submit the following report:

The efficiency of the postal service depends in a great degree on the condition of the accommodations afforded. The Post-Office Department can only succeed in reducing the percentage of delay, miscarriage, and loss of mail matter if Congress will remove one of the leading causes, the inefficient accommodations. Your committee have again carefully considered the Allentown case, as due respect to the message of the President demands, and have come to the unanimous conclusion that the necessity for a public building exists. The post-office is now located in a building not fire-proof, insufficient in space, and incapable of being so arranged as to properly conduct the service.

Allentown is rapidly increasing in population, and the evidence before the committee is that at the present time a suitable site can not be purchased for less than $30,000, leaving not more than $70,000 for the construction of the building. The objections of the President are as to the amount appropriated. Your committee are of the opinion that further delay in the purchase of a site would be false economy, for the price of land is steadily increasing, and that in the construction of the building some regard should be had for the steady increase of the postal business and the certain necessity for more room in the near future. It would be unwise to provide only for the present wants.

Your committee are of the opinion that the amount appropriated in the bill is not excessive and that the efficiency of the public service will be promoted by its passage; and therefore respectfully recommend that the bill be passed notwithstanding the objection by the President.

Mr. DIBBLE. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds have given very careful consideration to this case. The message of the President of the United States indicates that the veto is upon the ground that the appropriation is too large. There is nothing in the message to indicate the President would not have signed a bill appropriating a smaller amount of money. The expression used by the President is as follows:

But I am thoroughly convinced that there is no present necessity for the expenditure of $100,000 for any purpose connected with the public business at this place.

It was to that question the committee directed their attention. They found, Mr. Speaker, from the best information they could obtain, that a site for a public building would cost about $30,000, which would leave about $70,000 for the erection of the building. In view of the fact that Allentown is a place of some 30,000 people and is a place now growing very rapidly, it was the opinion of the committee that for the erection of a building providing not simply for the office of Allentown to-day, but for the next ten or fifteen years in the future, which would be wise economy, that the sum of $70,000 was not too large for the building, and the appropriation, therefore, of $100,000 did not appear to the committee to be excessive.

Mr. WISE. Is this building required for any other purpose than a post-office?

Mr. DIBBLE. It is not. It is simply required for a post-office. There are other Government offices there, but they are not of such a nature that the Government is obliged to provide accommodation for them, though they are of such a nature as are commonly accommodated when the public building is erected.

Mr. WISE. How many employés are in the post-office at Allentown?

Mr. DIBBLE. I have not the data, but I will get them for the gentleman.

Mr. BLOUNT. What are the gross receipts at this post-office?

Mr. DIBBLE. The gross receipts for the postal year ending June 30, 1887, were $23,397.54, which was an increase over the receipts of the prior year of about $2,500. I understand the receipts of the year just closed exceed the receipts of 1887 by some $4,000.

Mr. HERBERT. How much does the Government pay for rent?

Mr. DIBBLE. The Government is paying $1,300 rent.

Mr. HERBERT. Do you think we ought to have a $100,000 building?

Mr. DIBBLE. That lease will expire on 1st day of April, 1889, and at that time we are informed the Government will have to pay a higher rent; of course about a year hence. Does the gentleman desire to know the number of employés?

A MEMBER. The gentleman from Virginia is not now present.

Mr. DIBBLE. The annual receipts of the office have been $23,000, but are now $27,000 a year, which is a good deal more than the amount of revenue of some post-offices for which public buildings have been erected. It is clearly within the range of those cases where past Congresses have been in the habit of voting for the erection of public buildings. The other public offices which will be accommodated there are a deputy collector of internal revenue and a board of pension examiners.

That, Mr. Speaker, is about the case; and unless some member desires to discuss the question I will call for a vote.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I should like to have a moment.

Mr. DIBBLE. How much?

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I will not take more time than is absolutely necessary.

Mr. DIBBLE. I will yield for five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. As a part of my remarks, I ask the message of the President on this matter be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

PUBLIC BUILDING AT ALLENTOWN, PA.

Message from the President of the United States, returning House bill No. 4357, with his objections thereto.

To the House of Representatives:

I return without approval House bill No. 4357, entitled "An act to erect a public building at Allentown, Pa."

The accommodation of the postal business is the only public purpose for which the Government can be called on to provide, which is suggested as a pretext for the erection of this building. It is proposed to expend $100,000 for a structure to be used as a post-office. It is said that a deputy collector of internal revenue and a board of pension examiners are located at Allentown; but I do not understand that the Government is obliged to provide quarters for these officers.

The usual statement is made in support of this bill setting forth the growth of the city where it is proposed to locate the building and the amount and variety of the business which is there transacted. And the postmaster in stereotyped phrase represents the desirability of an increased accommodation for the transaction of the business under his charge.

But I am thoroughly convinced that there is no present necessity for the expenditure of $100,000 for any purpose connected with the public business at this place.

The annual rent now paid for the post-office is $1,300.

The interest at 3 per cent. upon the amount now asked for this new building is $3,000. As soon as it is undertaken the pay of a superintendent of its construction will begin, and after its completion the compensation of janitors and other expenses of its maintenance will follow.

The plan now pursued for the erection of public buildings is in my opinion very objectionable. They are often built where they are not needed, of dimensions and at a cost entirely disproportionate to any public use to which they can be applied, and as a consequence they frequently serve more to demonstrate the activity and pertinacity of those who represent localities desiring this kind of decoration at public expense than to meet any necessity of the Government.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, May 9, 1888.

Mr. DIBBLE. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT].

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, one of the reasons of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds for passing this bill over the veto of the President of the United States, which has just been read from the Clerk's desk, is that it is needed on account of the lack of proper postal facilities at that place. I do not know what methods the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds have resorted to for the purpose of ascertaining that there were not sufficient accommodations for the postal service there. The report does not disclose the facts which would show their familiarity with the service at that place and the inconvenience resulting from the lack of accommodations. My friend was not able to state, although chairman of the committee, the number of employés which were at work in that building. He did state that the gross receipts, obtained from the official statements, were about $23,000, and there was a conjectural estimate that that would be increased to about $27,000.

Now, it does not require a very large office to accommodate mail matter which only yields about $23,000 of gross receipts, and therefore it does not appear in the statement of the receipts or in anything else to indicate that at this small second-class post-office there is any occasion for this House deliberately to condemn the President of the United States by overriding the veto of this measure when he had by his side the officer at the head of the postal service of the United States, who naturally has the best sources of information as to the needs of the service in every part of the country.

I say, sir, that I trust the House will not on the invitation of a committee which has not had consideration of postal questions referred to it, and no peculiar advantages, deliberately adopt such a course, and pass the bill over the veto of the President of the United States.

What says that high official:

The usual statement is made in support of this bill setting forth the growth of the city where it is proposed to locate the building and the amount and variety of the business which is there transacted. And the postmaster in stereotyped phrase represents the desirability of increased accommodation for the transaction of the business under his charge.

This is the language of the Chief Executive, who perhaps gives more attention to the consideration of legislation than almost any of his predecessors, whose high character, whose integrity, and whose wisdom, so far as this side of the House is concerned and the party they represent, have had the highest sanction possible in his renomination to the high office he now holds. But the spectacle is presented here of a unanimous committee of this House on this small matter with its insignificant reasons overriding a Presidential veto.

Mr. Speaker, this House may see fit to adopt that course, but the judgment of the country will not be with us, but with the President; and I trust, sir, gentlemen will pause before they take such a step as this. We all know with what little care these bills have been passed, how lightly they are considered, how much personal interest so many of us have in them, and how likely we are to be misled by those considerations, and how much superior is the attitude of the President to enable him to form a just judgment in regard to them.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DIBBLE. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SOWDEN].

Mr. SOWDEN. Mr. Speaker, I regret very much that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] should have introduced politics into this discussion, and that he should have referred to the fact of the renomination by the Democratic party of the President whose veto message is now under consideration as a reason for this side of the Chamber to vote to sustain it.

Politics should have nothing to do with this matter, and the only object the gentleman could possibly have had in introducing them must have been to prejudice the minds of the Democratic members of this body and cause them to vote to sustain the President regardless of the fact as to whether he erred or not.

The question before the House is, whether or not the bill now being reconsidered shall pass, the veto of the President to the contrary notwithstanding. The right of the President to interpose the veto power to prevent profligate and ill-considered legislation no one will dispute. It is one of his constitutional prerogatives. Its exercise, however, should not be invoked unless it is clear that Congress failed to exercise proper care in the passage of the legislation vetoed. When the wisdom of the two Houses is united on a question involving no great constitutional principles nor grave questions of public policy, it seems to me that the President should be slow to use the veto power.

The committee to whom the message and bill now before the House were referred, after a careful examination came to the unanimous conclusion that the President had erred in vetoing this measure, and unanimously recommended its passage over his veto. The language used by the President in his message may or may not be of very doubtful propriety. I shall make no criticism upon its general tenor, although the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] has opened the door to it. I shall leave it uncriticised; the only question for our inquiry being whether the President's reasons are sound, and whether the facts involved warrant his conclusion.

The committee to whom the message was referred, in their report to the House find that the facts do not warrant the President in his conclusion, and therefore recommend the passage of the bill over his veto. Who is right—the President or the committee? The only reason urged by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] in support of the message is that this side of the House ought to stand by the President because he was renominated for the high office which he so creditably fills. There is neither sense nor logic in this position. To advance such an argument is not only unworthy of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT], but is an insult to the intelligence of this House. I hope no member will be misled by it.

Allentown is one of the most flourishing manufacturing cities in Pennsylvania and has a population of about 28,000. Its gross postal receipts for the year ending June 30, 1887, were $23,397.54; the total expenses $12,547.49, and the net income nearly $11,000. The receipts were increased nearly $4,000 during the postal year ending June 30, 1888. There are twelve or fifteen employés in the postal service at the Allentown office. The postmaster has continuously on hand from 200,000 to 300,000 postage-stamps, and from 70,000 to 100,000 postal-cards at this office with no vault in which safely to keep them. This of itself furnishes a strong reason for the necessity of a public building with a fire-proof vault in which safely to keep and protect the public property.

The postmaster is compelled to employ a man to sleep in the office every night to watch and guard the Government's property from theft or destruction by fire.

There is no new departure in the passage of this kind of legislation. It has become the settled policy of this Government to erect public buildings of this character wherever and whenever the necessity of the public service seemed to justify it. A large number of bills similar to that now being reconsidered were passed in the last and present Congresses, and with very few exceptions were approved by the Executive.

If there had been no precedents for the erection of public buildings that were to be used exclusively for the transaction of the postal business, I should not be here advocating the passage of this bill over the veto of the President.

A large number of these measures have passed Congress and been approved by the Executive. The President approved several such bills since he vetoed the one now before the House that were of far less merit. A large number of public buildings are now being built in cities that have less than one-half of the population of Allentown and where the postal receipts are not as large as those of the Allentown office.

There are many cases where the rent paid by the Government for post-office purposes is not nearly so high as that paid for the Allentown office, and where larger sums of money were appropriated for the erection of public buildings than is appropriated in the bill now being reconsidered. I could give many instances of this character if I had the time in which to do so, but I have not.

If the President had adopted the same reasoning he employed in his veto message of the Allentown bill in the Hoboken case, logic would have led him to veto that measure. He approved the bill for the erection of a public building in the city of Lancaster, Pa., since he vetoed this bill. That building, like those in Paterson and Hoboken, is to be used exclusively for the transaction of the postal business. The net postal receipts of the Hoboken office for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, were less than $7,000, and the President approved a bill appropriating $60,000 for the erection of a public building in that city. It would appear from this that he did not consider an appropriation of $10,000 too high for every $1,000 net postal receipts, and had he been governed by the same principle in the consideration of the Allentown bill it could not have escaped his approval. Had the President assigned any well-founded reasons for disapproving this bill the committee to whom his message was referred would surely not have been unanimous in recommending its passage over his veto.

His message and the bill should receive the most careful consideration of this House, and should be fairly discussed since we are called upon to discharge a constitutional duty of the highest possible character. If the gentleman from Georgia had confined himself to the discussion of the merits of the bill and the reasons given by the President for withholding his signature I should not complain, but to interject politics into a discussion of this high constitutional character is most questionable, and should have very little weight with right-thinking men.

I appeal to the members on this side of the House to disregard politics in this matter. It is a plain business proposition and should be so regarded by every member of this House. I hope that every member on this side of the House will support the report of the committee and vote to pass the bill now being reconsidered, the President's veto to the contrary notwithstanding, if only to show that the Democratic party is grand enough to rise superior to the errors of its leaders.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DIBBLE. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT].

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Speaker, the question in its first aspect is purely a business one. Here is a proposition to erect a building worth $100,000 to accommodate a post-office in a city where we now procure a building sufficient for the purposes at a rental of $1,300 only.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Will the gentleman excuse me?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HERBERT. I decline to yield.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I merely wish to say that it is not sufficient.

Mr. HERBERT. The gentleman must excuse me. I take it for granted that it is sufficient. A town of 30,000 inhabitants, which this city is said to have, can certainly furnish sufficient accommodations for its post-office; and any postmaster fit for his place will certainly procure, when to be had, proper accommodations; and we have the testimony of this committee that only $1,300 rental is paid. Now, if this bill proposed an expenditure of only $45,000 for the erection of this building it could not be justified as a business proposition. The interest on $45,000 at 3 per cent. would be $1,250, nearly the rental. The annual repairs would amount to fully $200 more, and besides this there would follow the appointment of a janitor or some other official to take care of the building, at a cost of $800 or $1,000.

A $100,000 building, a janitor at $1,000 to take care of it, and two or three hundred dollars a year for repairs! All this for a post-office now obtained for $1,300. Can any gentleman justify himself to his constituency for such a vote? But there is another, and a political aspect of this case. The President of the United States, when he was elected, was bound by his party platform, bound by his own promises, bound as a Democrat to administer his high office with due regard to economy. Seeing clearly how extravagant it was, and having the courage of his convictions, he has interposed between the Treasury and Congress his veto of this proposition.

Now the question is, will this Democratic House dare to condemn that veto? For one I am glad that the vote is under the Constitution to be taken by yeas and nays. I have no doubt that every Republican on this floor will march up with alacrity to sanction this extravagance and to condemn a Democratic President for arresting it with his veto, but I rejoice to know that the RECORD will show to the constituency of every Democrat how he is to vote on this occasion. What Democrats are there here to march up side by side with Republicans to condemn President Cleveland for this righteous veto, and who are the Democrats that will dodge and shirk this vote?

Mr. DIBBLE. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MONTGOMERY].

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I agree with the gentleman from Alabama that this is a business proposition. Indeed, all these bills for public buildings ought to be considered as business propositions. To carry out the idea that there ought to be some uniform and just rule which would obviate this great waste of public money and do justice to small as well as larger towns, there has been reported and is now on the Calendar of this House a bill which proposes, if we intend to continue this system of erecting buildings for post-offices, to establish a uniform system in this country for building them.

That bill is on the Calendar with a favorable report of the committee, and I will ask that the second and third sections of that bill be read from the Clerk's desk, in order that the House may have information and understand what, in the judgment of the committee which formulated and reported it, would be a fair expenditure for a building in a town of the size of the one under discussion, where the gross receipts from the post-office amount to less than $25,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DIBBLE. I yield sufficient time for the reading of that bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the Postmaster-General shall cause to be prepared by the Architect of the Post-Office Department, with the assistance of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury, who is directed to furnish his counsel and aid thereto, a design for post-office buildings, which, being adopted, shall be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, the Postmaster-General, and the Secretary of the Interior; that such design and plans shall be so devised as to enable the construction of post-offices of such variable size as may be required at the Presidential offices, so that additions or extensions to their capacity may be constructed from time to time in the future without injury to the harmony of the design or the usefulness of the constructed portion; that such design and plans shall be of uniform general character and exterior appearance, and, so far as may be most expedient for the service to be performed in them, of interior arrangement; and that all such buildings shall be constructed with a view to being fire-proof.

SEC. 3. That the Postmaster-General is authorized from time to time to construct, in his discretion, post-office buildings in accordance with the general design and plans so to be provided as aforesaid, at any place at which the gross receipts of the post-office for two years or more preceding shall have exceeded the sum of $3,000 in each year, but not in excess of the amounts which may be from time to time appropriated for such purpose by Congress; and for that purpose the Postmaster-General shall cause the proper working drawings for any such buildings as he shall so determine to construct to be prepared in accordance with the general design and plans aforesaid, and shall determine of what materials any particular building shall be built: Provided, That the cost of no such building shall exceed to the United States $25,000, and that the cost of no such building at any place where the post-office receipts for each of the two preceding years shall have been no more than $25,000 shall exceed to the United States $20,000, and that the cost of no such building at any place where the receipts for each of the two preceding years shall have been more than $20,000 shall exceed to the United States $15,000. That all contracts for the construction of such buildings and for materials, fixtures, or apparatus to be used in such construction shall be let to the lowest bidder after such advertisement for proposals as the Postmaster-General shall direct shall have been made for not less that three weeks, at least one of which such advertisements shall be printed in a newspaper published at the place where such building is intended to be constructed, if any such there be.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. The House will see that under that bill $20,000 would be the amount allowed to build a post-office in this town; and that bill can be passed at any time if the House should so desire, and ought to be passed if we intend to persist in this system of building post-offices.

Mr. DIBBLE. I would ask the gentleman how $20,000 is going to erect a building where the site will cost $30,000?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. If the gentleman will examine the fourth section of this bill he will find out how that would be done.

Mr. Speaker, I will never have a better opportunity than this, when the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds are attempting to pass a bill over the veto of the President, to enter my earnest protest not only to the extravagance but the manner of the expenditures of the public revenues for public buildings intended only to beautify and adorn favored cities. I have been protesting with this side of the House against four-fifths of the taxes that are levied on the consumers of this country under our present tariff never reaching the Treasury but going directly into the pockets of the favored few of favored localities. I now protest against the fifth, that does reach the Treasury, being squandered in extravagant appropriations for public buildings in favored cities. One hundred thousand dollars for a post-office in a town for which only 30,000 inhabitants are claimed looks rather extravagant to a member from an agricultural district in which not one dollar out of the millions wasted under this and similar legislation is ever expended. Those who get no benefit from these expenditures have a right to demand either that this system of public buildings cease or that some uniform system be adopted, in the benefits of which all parts of the country can share alike and in which uniformity, economy, and the demands of the public service shall alone be consulted.

Mr. BUCKALEW. It is with some reluctance that I vote against the passage of this bill, for it would be agreeable to me to accommodate my neighbors in the city of Allentown, who desire a beautiful public building to be erected within its limits, and they can plead, I suppose with truth, that some other towns in the United States with no greater merit than theirs have been so accommodated. But this bill proposes a building for post-office purposes alone, and not for the use of the courts of the United States nor for any more extended purpose, and it therefore does not fall within the class of public buildings which we readily pass, where a double purpose of the Government is to be subserved. In the next place, I am entirely convinced that the reason assigned for the veto in this bill, to wit, an unnecessary amount of expenditure, is true and well taken.

I have no doubt, sir, that a good building, of fair proportions, of beautiful architectural design, and of ample extent for all post-office purposes could be erected for one-half of the money which, under the provisions of this bill, can be devoted to that purpose; and this bill will constitute a scale or standard for other cases which shall hereafter arise. Therefore I think we ought to object to the erection of this standard, and confine ourselves to one more adapted to the purposes of economy and the necessities of the Government. I will conclude by saying, as my time is limited, that with considerable reluctance on account of neighborship and personal association, but with clear convictions upon public grounds for reasons which apply to this measure, I shall be compelled to vote against it.

Mr. DIBBLE. Mr. Speaker, this is a pure business question. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] was pleased to depart from its business aspects and to introduce some political references. Now, sir, on all political questions, I am proud to say to the gentleman from Georgia that I have always found I could conscientiously support the President of the United States. But this is simply a case where the President, in the exercise of his undoubted prerogative, has said to the House of Representatives: "I think you have voted too large an amount for this public building, and I therefore return the bill with that objection."

What is the effect of that, Mr. Speaker? Does it mean that the President of the United States says to his political friends in the House of Representatives, "I tell you to support me in that view?" That certainly is not the position which the President would take; that is not the constitutional position; and no one who has ever been elevated to the high office of President would for a moment take such a position in a message to the Houses of Congress. Is it in violation of party fealty to differ on a business question of dollars and cents involving no political principle, and does the gentleman from Georgia mean to intimate that a Democratic President would attempt in a message to dictate to a House with a Democratic majority? I, for one, would dislike to entertain such a charge against a President in whom I have the confidence that I have in the present Executive of the United States.

The President has simply done what he thinks is his duty. He has asked the House to reconsider this measure, and that is what the Constitution requires the House to do.

And, Mr. Speaker, in what way did the House proceed to reconsider this measure? Hastily? Not at all. They referred it to the committee which had reported the bill, and that committee took it up as a new proposition. They considered the message of the President. The objection which he had stated was that $100,000 was too much. They devoted themselves to that question irrespective of party, without any intention to do other than to consider it anew as a business proposition, without any prejudice, without any influence from the Executive or from any other source. It is the constitutional prerogative of this House, when a measure is returned by the President, to consider it without influence and on its merits, and in that way only can legislative independence be preserved. As I stated before, the Executive in this veto message does not address instructions to the majority of this House; simply asks the House to reconsider this matter. He says in substance, "I think a hundred thousand dollars is too much for this purpose; reconsider the matter under the Constitution."

The committee took the bill up deliberately and referred it to a subcommittee, that subcommittee investigated, and they found on that investigation that in numerous instances under acts of Congress buildings had been erected which cost more than $100,000 in places where fewer facilities were required to transact the public business than in Allentown. They found that public buildings had been erected in places where the rental was no more than the rental at Allentown; in fact, they found, Mr. Speaker, that the Allentown bill had numerous precedents in this and in previous Congresses.

They formed their judgment and they have submitted it now to the House for its decision. They came to the conclusion as business men that the amount provided in the bill was not excessive. Their information is that a proper site for this building will cost $30,000. That leaves $70,000 for the erection of the building. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have here the report of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury, in which will be found several buildings for post-offices simply, and there is scarcely a public building anywhere in this country that has been erected for so small an amount as $70,000. There is no public building in the country in a place of the size of Allentown which, whatever the original limit of cost may have been, has been erected for less than $70,000—I mean within the last twenty years. This bill might have been reported for $50,000; it might have passed for $50,000; it might have been approved for $50,000. Undoubtedly, from the tenor of the President's message, if the bill had been for $50,000 or $60,000 he would have approved it.

He has approved at this session a bill for a public building for a much smaller place, involving an appropriation of $60,000. What would have been the result? This bill, with an insufficient appropriation, would have gone upon the statute-book as a law; $30,000 of the money would have been expended for the site and only $30,000 would have remained for the building. Then next session there would be a bill to increase the limit of cost, a foothold having been gained by the first small appropriation of $50,000 or $60,000, and on investigation we would have had to report $30,000 insufficient for the purpose, and the consequence would have been that the building would have cost $100,000 before it was completed. Now, sir, I am in favor of making these appropriations large enough in the first instance, and then holding the executive officers strictly down to the limit.

It has been the purpose of the committee at this session so to shape their recommendations as to subserve that end; and this amount, according to the experience with all the buildings now being erected and which have heretofore been erected, will not do more than put up such a public building as the city of Allentown requires for the accommodation of the public business in the next ten or fifteen years.

In view of these considerations, Mr. Speaker, we submit the matter to the House, and I call the previous question upon this whole matter.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall this bill pass, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding? According to the requirement of the Constitution, this question must be taken by yeas and nays.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 140, nays 82, not voting 102; as follows:

So (two-thirds not voting in favor thereof) the bill was not passed.

Mr. COWLES. On this bill I am paired with the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. THOMPSON. If he were present, I would vote "no."

Mr. TIMOTHY J. CAMPBELL. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. BELDEN. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "no."

The following-named members were announced as paired on all political questions until further notice:

The following pairs were also announced:
Mr. HOGG with Mr. BINGHAM, on this bill.
Mr. RANDALL with Mr. WISE, on this vote.
Mr. OUTHWAITE with Mr. SYMES, till Saturday.
Mr. COWLES with Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio, on this bill.
Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. I am paired for the day with Judge KELLEY, of Pennsylvania.
Mr. WISE. If I were not paired on this question with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL], I would vote "no."
Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. I observe by the announcements that I am paired with the gentleman from New York, Mr. FITCH. I paired simply on political questions, and supposed my pair was with the gentleman from New York, Mr. BLISS. I have voted on this question, and I want my vote to stand.
Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. A number of gentlemen on this side of the House who are paired on political questions have refrained from voting, construing this to be such a question. If it is not to be so construed, we ought to know it.
Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. Without my own knowledge I was paired. I propose, of course, to observe the pair in order to accommodate the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITCH]. I supposed the pair was with the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLISS], but I now find that it is with his colleague [Mr. FITCH] who is, of course, of the same political faith as myself on general principles. But I do not consider this a political question, and I wish my vote to stand as recorded.
Mr. BURROWS. I am paired with the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN].
The result of the vote was announced as above stated.
[Applause on the Democratic side.]

EXPLANATION OF A VOTE.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.
Mr. HATCH. On yesterday, on the motion to adjourn, on the demand for the yeas and nays I voted, having been informed by the Assistant Sergeant-at-Arms that my pair with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PUGSLEY], which had been in operation for some three or four days, had been withdrawn by him. Under that statement I allowed my vote to stand. The RECORD this morning shows that I voted in the affirmative, but that the pair had also been announced from the Clerk's desk, and I want the necessary correction to be made.
The SPEAKER. The correction will be made.

SELECT COMMITTEE ON CONTRACT LABOR, ETC.

Mr. SHAW. Mr. Speaker, I submit a privileged report from the Committee on Accounts.
The SPEAKER. The report will be read.
The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Accounts, to whom was referred the accompanying resolution:

"Resolved, That the select committee to inquire into the importation of contract laborers, convicts, and paupers be, and they are hereby, authorized to employ such additional messengers and other assistants as may, in the judgment of said committee, be deemed necessary; and that the sum of —— thousand dollars, or so so much thereof as may be necessary, to pay the expenses of said committee shall be immediately available and payable out of the contingent fund of the House on the order of the chairman and one member of said committee, in sums not exceeding $1,000 at one time; and all vouchers for any such expenditure shall be likewise certified to by the chairman and one member of the committee; and said committee may report at any time"— having considered the same, report it back, and recommend the adoption of the following amendments:
